writes Mrs. F. C. Lord of Brooklyn, N. Y.

Gentlemen:

I have been using Pebeco Tooth Paste for the past seventeen years. I have experimented with various other tooth pastes, but in every instance I have returned to Pebeco and now I feel I could not be induced to change.

My reasons for admiring Pebeco are, first, it has kept my teeth beautifully white and sound and my gums in perfect condition; and, second, it imparts a feeling of freshness and cleanliness to the mouth which also assures me that my breath is sweet.

I am one who annually visits my dentist for an examination and advice and have many times been complimented by him upon the splendid condition of my teeth, the absence of tartar or any discoloration and the sound, healthy condition of my gums, all of which I attribute to Pebeco Tooth Paste.

Yours very truly,
(Signed) MRS. F. C. LORD

Enthusiastic letters tell how PEBECO has safeguarded people's teeth. Try it yourself. See how healthy and young it keeps your mouth.

Your teeth feel so clean, your mouth so fresh, you want to smile

Your mouth sweet . . your teeth protected

TO BE CONFIDENT all day long of a clean healthy mouth. How few of us after our early youth know this experience! How few can be proud of unimpaired teeth!

A great medical authority, fighting unhealthy conditions of the mouth, found a slowing up of the mouth fluids to be the great cause of modern tooth trouble. And so he devised the famous formula of Pebeco.

Taste Pebeco. Instantly its salty tang wakens the mouth fluids. Effectually they wash away food particles, sweeten the breath, neutralize the acids that cause decay.

For hours your mouth stays dewy and sweet, protected through the day by the morning brushing with Pebeco, made safe for the night by the bedtime brushing.

Are you tying up the most valuable pair of hands in your office?

Fatigue can tie your stenographer's hands as effectually as a cord—ask your stenographer.

Fifty thousand times a day the delicate nerve centers in her finger-tips are shocked as her typewriter keys hit bottom. The result is a steady drain of nervous energy that may even result in Functional Neurosis.

This never happens with an L C Smith. Its ball-bearing action is supremely easy, light and swift—and the keys never touch bottom. You are investing a lot of money in her hands. Give them the typewriter that's easiest to operate.

having work to do she kept at it night and day. Her second marriage, to Mr. McGraw, took place. She was established, a rising and successful young physician and surgeon.

Then Fate, which had been dozing, woke up. Doctor McGraw was taken ill with a mysterious malady. She was hurried out to Rochester, Minnesota, to the famous Mayo brothers. "It's overwork," declared the Mayos.

That year she fought the illness off, resumed her practice. The next year it was back again, and in the third year, and fourth. Fight as she would, the disease returned as surely as the seasons—intestinal influenza, for medicine had discovered for it a name.

In the winter of 1917, Doctor McGraw suffered her seventh and most serious attack of the malady. During months there was little hope for her life. Her own earnings had stopped, and those of her husband were swallowed by the expenses.

"I was sitting in my office one day when another patient came in," said Doctor McGraw. "He had come all the way from the cattle ranges of McPherson County. He knew of my plight.

"'Why don't you try our country a while?' he suggested. 'We haven't electric lights and steam heat, but we have the finest air and water in the world, and plenty of space in which to breathe. What is more, we haven't any doctor. We need a doctor.'

"It was eleven o'clock in the morning when he left. What he had said kept returning to my mind. All I knew of McPherson County was that it contained a town called Tryon, and cows, and dry air. But what appealed to me was the name, 'Tryon—try on.' I couldn't put that challenge out of my thoughts.

"AT NOON my husband came home. I told him of Tryon. 'But in the fall I'm going to take you to California to live,' he reminded. We had already made our plans for California. 'Yet there is a whole summer ahead,' I insisted. 'I could spend the summer at Tryon and then go on to California. It wouldn't cost much; and there's no doctor in Tryon, so I'd have something to do.' He left the decision to me, and before long I was on a train bound for North Platte."

"Then you never intended to remain in Tryon?" I asked.

"I had no more intention of settling down here than I now have of moving to the moon," she answered. "When I got here the country frightened me, the space frightened me, and the loneliness made me want to run out of it as fast as I could go. My fear was not only physical but mental as well. I realized how far I was from a hospital, that in all of these miles I was the only one of my kind. I was afraid for my own professional courage, afraid that I might make a mistake that would cost a life."

"What made you stay?"

"My first ambition was to be a missionary in far places," she said, after a moment. "Perhaps some of that ambition remained. But there was something else—the hospitality of these people. In all of my life I have never felt so much at home, so close to people's hearts, so appreciated, you might say, as I have here in Tryon. They needed me, and, yes, I

You may have tuberculosis

Watch for these danger signs=

- too easily tired
- loss of weight
- indigestion
- cough that hangs on

Let your doctor decide

TUBERCULOSIS can be cured more easily than any other dangerous, chronic disease. Some doctors say "arrested", others say "cured"—it amounts to the same thing. If it is detected in its early stages it can be stopped before serious damage is done.

For thousands of years, tuberculosis has been mankind's great scourge. Whole families have been blotted out. Even now, when science knows exactly what causes tuberculosis, how to prevent it and how to cure it, one family in every 50 pays toll to this disease. These tragedies are largely due to ignorance or neglect.

Young people of high school ages, and young women up to the age of 25, are especially susceptible. Tuberculosis exacts heavy penalties from men and women between 25 and 50—at the time when most needed by their families.

The danger signals of tuberculosis are usually plain to be seen and the danger is great—unless the signals are heeded.

Tuberculosis is like a fire started by a match. Stepped on immediately, the fire is stamped out completely. But if permitted to gain too much headway, it sweeps on to destruction.

In the month of March 1928, a nation-wide campaign for the early diagnosis of tuberculosis will be conducted by more than 1500 tuberculosis and health associations of the United States. They will organize meetings where information will be given, motion pictures and posters will be shown and pamphlets distributed, all emphasizing the importance of early diagnosis.

People will be told to watch for the first signs of tuberculosis. They will be asked to answer these four questions:

1. Do you tire easily?
2. Are you losing weight?
3. Do you suffer from indigestion?
4. Have you a cough which hangs on?

There will be many instances, of course, in which people may have all four of these weaknesses without having contracted tuberculosis. But if the answer is "yes" to any one or more of these questions, act instantly. Go to your physician for a complete medical examination. He will not merely put his ear to your partly covered chest and then give an opinion. With stethoscope on bared chest, perhaps with X-ray photographs and other diagnostic tests, he will seek to discover definitely the condition of your lungs. Then he will advise what should be done for prevention or cure.

Hopeful, but ill-advised sufferers have wasted millions of dollars on so-called "remedies" for tuberculosis, in spite of the fact that all great medical authorities agree that not one person has ever been cured in this way. But, on the other hand, many thousands of tuberculous patients who have gone to a sanatorium and had the benefit of scientific medical care in addition to Rest, Fresh Air, Sunshine and Nourishing Food, have come back to their families—cured. Every modern sanatorium that is built to care for tuberculous patients helps to reduce the deathrate.

The big, life-saving message to the nation in March will be, "Find out—don't wait".

The war to prevent and cure tuberculosis is one of the brilliant triumphs of modern science. The deathrate from tuberculosis has been reduced almost two-thirds during the past 40 years.

Now statisticians boldly predict that during the lifetime of the majority of the readers of this announcement tuberculosis will be under such thorough control that it will be an infrequent cause of death.

Think what it means. Twenty years ago the principal cause of death—twenty years from now an infrequent cause of death.

At first the fight was a stubborn one and at times discouraging. When cases reached physicians they had usually advanced too far for successful treatment. Later, when cases were discovered in early stages the tide turned. Today—thanks to greatly increased knowledge of preventive measures and to the widespread cooperation of individuals, as well as official and private organizations, with the medical profession—tremendous gains are in sight.

The Metropolitan urges people in all parts of the country to give whole-hearted support to the March campaign of the national and local tuberculosis and health associations for early diagnosis and immediate action. A copy of the Metropolitan's booklet, "Tuberculosis", will be mailed free to every person asking for it.

More lovable . . .

more difficult to manage every day

So many ways in which he needs your guidance!

THINGS he neglects . . . things he forgets . . . things he doesn't understand . . . He cannot even guess how much his health and vigor, his whole success in years to come, depend upon your guidance.

Now, beginning to act and think for himself, he grows more lovable every day—but more difficult to look after. The food he will or will not eat at breakfast, for instance, what problems it gives you!

So widespread are bad habits of eating among school children today, particularly at breakfast, that they have become the subject of a nation-wide health campaign.

This rule now hangs on the walls of over 70,000 schools.

"Every boy and girl needs a hot cereal breakfast"

The American Medical Association and the National Education Association are today urging all mothers to see that their children eat a hot cooked cereal in the morning. It is now definitely established that children work better and learn more when they are given a hot cooked cereal regularly for breakfast.

How confident you yourself feel that your boy is well fed when you see him putting down a good hot bowl of Cream of Wheat before school.

For over thirty years, health authorities and mothers have found Cream of Wheat ideal for growing children for these reasons:

First, it is unusually rich in energy—in just those food elements needed most by little minds and bodies. Second, it is exceptionally easy to digest, containing none of the harsh, indigestible parts of the wheat. Third, children love its creamy richness so easily varied by adding raisins, dates or prunes while cooking it.

It is easy now to care for your children in this little thing that means so much to their success. The simple plan described below will help you to arouse their enthusiasm for a hot cooked cereal breakfast. Start them off to school really prepared for a good day's work. Give them regularly a hot bowl of good old Cream of Wheat. All grocers have it.

needed them. Also, I needed this country.

"The air is wonderful, the water is wonderful, the range with all its openness is wonderful. My first night here, despite all my fears, I slept like a child.

"I left once," she confessed. "We went on to California, as we had planned. My health had improved, and after nine months in California we decided to go to Ord, Nebraska, to make our permanent home. Our tickets were bought and our baggage checked to Ord. On the way to the station, we stopped at the post office to pick up the last bit of mail. Among the letters were three postmarked at Tryon and they were from patients I had treated there. 'When are you coming back?' asked the first. 'We miss you,' read the second. And the third said 'California may be fine, but McPherson County needs you more than any other place in the world.'

"We looked at the letters and then at our tickets. I felt ashamed at even having thought of going to Ord. 'Maybe there's room for a lawyer in Tryon, too,' said my husband, and we both laughed. I didn't have to tell him to change the tickets. It was good to be so needed—and missed."

DOCTOR MCGRAW'S first office in Tryon was a little one-room, one-story building that had been used as an ice-cream parlor. The rent was eight dollars a month; the furnishings were the tables and chairs which had been used for serving ice cream. She herself scrubbed up the room, cleaned the windows, and arranged it in order. Her first patient was a rancher, in acute pain.

"All I had brought with me on arrival was a small hand-grip," the doctor explained; "and the nearest drug store was at Stapleton. You see, my husband was to bring out my medicine kit and he had not yet appeared. Here was an emergency in which my early training saved the day. I gave the rancher hydrotherapeutic treatment, and he got better almost at once. He was so grateful that he took me out in his car and introduced me to all of his friends.

"The following Sunday a boy broke his arm. I administered chloroform and set the arm to everyone's satisfaction. A daughter of the presiding judge fractured a rib in a fall, and she was brought to me. It seemed that every new patient became a friend and supporter."

Mothers brought their children to the new doctor; but still the majority of the men stayed away, unable to find confidence in a woman. Then, that same month, a seventy-two-year-old farmer was caught in his mowing machine, dragged, and horribly mangled by the knives. Doctor McGraw drove eighteen miles to his aid over the worst trails the county had. With no other help than that furnished by neighbors, she sewed and dressed the man's wounds. His recovery became the talk of the county.

"Wait until the winter comes," bade the remaining skeptics.

Winter came, one of the worst the range had known in years. And during the worst week of that winter eight babies were born in McPherson County. One night, during a blinding snowstorm, one of these "stork" calls came in from a farm eight miles from Tryon.

The liveryman refused to go out, saying she used this dentifrice and now her smile is envied everywhere

AS a child, that radiant smile, revealing two rows of beautiful white, clean teeth, brought her admirers, invitations, friends. These things gave her a confidence, an assurance, in everything she tried to do.

And, as a child, she began using Colgate's. "It is so long ago," she declares, "I cannot remember when I bought my first tube."

The photograph shows you the kind of smile she has today, and in that smile you see how little change the years have made in that stunning set of teeth—teeth that are convincing evidence of the value of this cleansing dentifrice.

Ever since the days of hair-ribbons, Miss Lynch has brushed her teeth with Colgate's

Miss Lynch as a school girl

In this country, and in foreign countries the world over, you will find thousands and thousands of men and women who began using Colgate's ten, fifteen, even twenty years ago, and whose teeth today are exceptionally sound and beautiful.

Many of these people are grateful enough to write us. Some send their photographs also. Each day the postman brings a few more letters to add to an already bulging file. Many of these letters come from users who have brushed with Colgate's for at least a decade. We could fill the pages of this magazine with quotations from them—sincere, unsolicited reports from people proud of the soundness and attractiveness of their teeth.

There is nothing mysterious about these enviable results. These people did nothing that you cannot easily do.

They visited their dentist for periodic inspections. And they used Colgate's Ribbon Dental Cream.

Choose your dentifrice on the basis of results. Follow the lead of those who have already kept their teeth sound for years. Simply adopt for your own use the dentifrice most popular among people with well-preserved teeth.

On the one hand you have Colgate's, the chief and only feature of which is thorough cleansing. On the other, you have the fact that countless people who have used Colgate's for years now have exceptionally fine teeth.

In such a vital matter as the care of your teeth, could there be any safer guide than the actual experiences of people like yourself?

CLEAN!

Years ago we set out to make the best dentifrice possible. We interviewed leading dental authorities. They told us that the one thing a dentifrice should do is to clean teeth. We then produced Ribbon Dental Cream — designing it to do that one thing superlatively well. It is not medicated, because all experiments in the meantime have sustained the original principle that cleansing is the only thing a dentifrice can do.

Colgate & Co. Est. 1806

Also wouldn't it be an immense satisfaction to know that the dentifrice you were using was the one which dentists recommend most frequently?

So for lovely teeth—for teeth that make your smile the social and business asset that it should be—ask your druggist today for Colgate's. Or, if you prefer, try the free sample offered below.

it was certain they would be lost if he did.

"If you send a team for me, I'll go back with it," Doctor McGraw telephoned the farmer. "You can surely find Tryon, and we can trust to your horses to find the way home."

The farmer sent a son with the team. He reached Tryon after two hours of driving, picked up the doctor, gave the horses the reins and let them go as they would. The horses turned for home, and Doctor McGraw was in time for the big event. The baby of the storm lived, as did all the other babies born during that week.

That first year Doctor McGraw did not lose a single patient. She did not refuse a single call, regardless of weather, roads, or who made it. Folks found they had a doctor who came without fail, and who trusted them to pay when they got the money. Rarely did they fail to make payment.

MCPHERSON COUNTY was won over that winter to unshaken faith in its woman doctor. A farmer's wife gave me an insight into the extent of that faith. This wife was down on her back, deathly ill. A male physician who was summoned told her that if she was operated on she would die.

"I called Doctor McGraw," said the woman, "and she told me that I'd die if I wasn't operated on, and at once. She made no ifs about it, and I was operated on. You can see that I'm alive and pretty husky to-day, and the one person I can thank is Doctor McGraw."

"What I like about the 'Doc'," a native told me, "is that she comes in spite of Hell."

Yes, in spite of everything. March, a year ago, the so-called roads were impassable for three days. People stuck to their firesides. The mail carrier was unable to get through from North Platte. Twenty-six miles away was an expectant mother, waiting for the arrival of the doctor.

"She'll never get here," said a neighbor at the bedside.

"She said she'd be here," insisted the prostrate woman. "She promised, and she'll come."

In company with a son of the hotel keeper, Doctor McGraw left her little bungalow at Tryon at two-forty-five o'clock in the morning, by automobile. Since the roads were impassable, they took to the open range. The boy had wire cutters along, and when they came to a fence he cut through it. The wind had blown the snow shallow on the hill tops, so he guided the car from crest to crest, thus avoiding the drifts that closed the regular trail. Through drifts that were between the hills, he shoveled their way.

At ten o'clock that morning Doctor McGraw reached the farm, to find that the case was not one to be trusted to the facilities available there. She improvised a bed in the auto, had the woman put on it, and the journey back to Tryon began. They didn't reach town until that evening.

The baby, a girl, was born in the doctor's house, and with the mother was nursed there for two weeks, because Doctor McGraw could get no other trained nurse than herself. Both patients lived—and the girl is named Harriet.

For the more serious operations, Doctor McGraw takes her patients to a hos-

WHEN CRINOLINES WERE ALL THE RAGE!

Lucas Paint Products were already the vogue for color, beauty and home decoration.

In these colorful times, more people are turning to color decoration, not only in furnishings and hangings, but in walls, floors and furniture, as a cheerful ensemble.

That is why so many home owners and painters use Lucas Paint Products for smart, modern interiors as well as for bright colorful exteriors.

Lucas Paint Products have kept apace with the change in style, with the demand for color—but their high quality has remained constant. The same integrity has won and retained the approval of America during 79 years.

Wherever paint, varnish, enamels, lacquers or stains are required—for whatever purpose—there's a Lucas Product especially made for the purpose. When you need paint, for any surface or condition, insist upon Lucas.

"What temperatures do you get here in the winter?" I asked the ex-judge as I was preparing to go.

"Oh, twenty-six, thirty, degrees below, he answered. "That is cold weather. The snow gets from one to five feet in depth, and in the drifts it is from ten to twenty feet deep."

"What does she earn?" I asked.

"Not a penny more than twenty-five hundred a year," said the ex-judge. "Out of that, she must run her car and buy her medicine and supplies, for she doesn't charge patients for medicine as the others did. She is a member of the American Medical Association and of the association at North Platte, to which she must pay dues. No; she isn't here for the money that's in it."

"Why is she here?" I asked.

"She belongs here; they need her here, and she knows it," he replied. "It is her mission in life. She was made for it."

NEXT month this magazine presents two widely different men: George J. Higgins has made more than a million dollars in the motion-picture business, yet he sticks to his job of station agent in a small town because he loves it. John Kane, a house painter, untutored, poor and alone, is striving to express his dream of becoming an artist. Yet throughout their personal stories runs the same thread of idealism, and the same fine understanding of life and its values, that The American Magazine is always looking for in the material which it prints.

to my religious adviser and told him that, instead of entering the monastery, I wanted to go out into the world—because I believed I had something to give the world.

"He was very kind and understanding; told me not to be troubled about it but to let the matter work itself out.

"To a certain extent, that is what happened. The revolution had made a great change in our own family fortunes. It was plain that my father would need my help; and this was one factor in helping me to decide. But, even without that, I should have done as I did; because I was sure, in my own mind, that I had some talent which I ought to develop.

"For a long time, I could not convince anyone else that I was right! I had a constant succession of discouragements. I worked hard. I almost starved. But I never lost faith."

"Do you believe there is a God?" I asked.

"There is!" he said, with quiet earnestness. "It is inconceivable that this marvelous world should not have had a Creator. People reject religion because, as they say, they cannot understand it.

The Airman commands the world's admiration

COURIERS of the air—dashing, confident men of adventurous spirit. Day after day they wing their fearless way across the sky. They fire the imagination—they symbolize progress.

In their epoch-making flights, America's airmen have supplied the final endorsement of air-cooling—the advanced engine-cooling principle so thoroughly proven by Franklin Owners. And now, in the new Franklin Airman, the air-cooled engine is presented to the world in its finest setting—a motor car designed and built throughout, in the advanced spirit of the airplane.

Its abundant power and instant acceleration—its long-sustained high speed of a mile-a-minute or better—command the admiration of all who drive fine cars. Scientific light weight construction and synchronized, 4-wheel, hydraulic brakes guarantee easy handling and sure control.

And the world's fastest car in a day's run affords a greater degree of riding comfort than you have ever experienced.

You want the car you drive to reflect the foremost advancements in engineering and performance. Join with the leaders of the new age of fast travel—drive an Airman. Franklin dealers are glad to demonstrate for you—and to explain the favorable terms on which Airman ownership may be arranged.

But if our human brains could understand God, He would not be God! He would be no greater than we are.

"As soon as we know—or think we know—all there is to be known about any one thing, we lose interest in it, and pass on to something else.

"Now, take love itself. It is a common experience that a man's love for a woman becomes less eager, less absorbing, when he has learned to read her every thought, to know exactly what she will do and why she will do it.

"It would be the same thing with religion; with God Himself. If we were capable of comprehending Him, He could not satisfy us."

THROUGHOUT the interview, Novarro was natural and unaffected; but never more so than when he talked of religion. The only difference was that his interest was greater whenever we discussed "the things of the spirit."

Yet he is a perfectly normal, well-balanced young man. He is fundamentally serious; but he has a nice sense of humor, plenty of physical energy, and a definite attitude on practical matters. He is neither a dreamer nor a pious fanatic.

Going on with the story of his life, he told me how he finally persuaded his father and mother to let him follow the purpose he had in mind.

"I wanted to come to the States," he said, "because this, above all countries, is the Land of Opportunity. So, in November, 1916, I went to Los Angeles. I remember that I arrived on Thanksgiving Day—which seemed very appropriate then. But," he laughed, "a long time went by before I had anything else to be thankful for.

"A certain degree of musical talent was the only asset I had. I sang, and I played the piano. This was fortunate, for it helped me to earn a little money by giving piano lessons.

"But the thing I wanted most was to be an actor; so, day after day and week after week, I haunted the theatres and the managers' offices, begging for a chance to do anything, no matter how insignificant.

"It wasn't until March, 1917, that I had any success at all. Then I was hired as an extra in a motion picture studio. My services were not often in demand. I earned, in this work, only three dollars a day, three or four times a month; but with my few piano pupils I managed to scrape along.

"This went on for more than a year. Then I was engaged by Miss Marian Morgan for a pantomime vaudeville sketch called 'Attila and the Huns.'

"People had tried to discourage me by saying that I couldn't succeed in the United States because I was a foreigner. I could not even speak English well when I left Mexico. My father spoke it perfectly; but at home we always conversed in Spanish."

This was interesting, for Novarro not only speaks fluent English now but his vocabulary is one which even a highly educated American might well envy him. He has a very slight accent; but he never hesitates for a word and his choice of words is unerringly good.

"When Miss Morgan engaged me," he went on, "my English had vastly improved, but this was of no importance in pantomime. The real reason for my getting the part was the fact that I was a foreigner.

At that time, the war was not yet over; so Miss Morgan hesitated to engage American boys, because they might be called to military service at any moment. This was her chief reason for taking me. The engagement lasted a few months on the vaudeville circuit. When we reached Los Angeles, I decided to stay there.

"After a while I was hired as an usher in the Majestic Theatre at five dollars a week. I couldn't afford to go to a dramatic school, so I asked for this job as usher, hoping to make the theatre itself my school. If I could see the same play night after night, study the way the lines were spoken, and watch the action, I believed I could learn a great deal.

"It was a stock company, with a change of program every week, or occasionally after a two-weeks run. On Friday nights, the rôles for the next play were given out by Miss Wilkes, the casting director; and every Friday I went back to the stage, hoping to be given a part, no matter how small. No one ever seemed to pay any attention to me; but I went just the same.

"Finally, just because I was always there, Miss Wilkes became interested. She saw that I was at least persistent; which alone was worth something. So she began to question me, encouraged me to tell her my hopes and my purposes. She believed that they were purposes; not merely hopes. And so, at last, she actually gave me a part.

"In fact, two parts in the same play. But they were so small that the two together made a very inconspicuous total. However, it was the first step on the ladder, and I was as thrilled as if someone had given me a fortune.

"Financially, it was quite the reverse! The play was to last only a week and my salary was to be nine dollars. But in one part I had to wear a tuxedo; and in the other a waiter's suit. Also, I needed, for the first rôle, a pair of patent leather shoes. But as my scanty wardrobe contained none of these articles of dress I had to rent the suits, which cost me nine dollars for the week; and I had to buy the shoes, which also cost nine dollars.

"BY THAT time, my father had brought the family to Los Angeles and we were all living together. But my father's eyesight had begun to fail; and building up a new practice under these conditions was impossible. We were poor; really desperately poor.

"You can imagine, therefore, how my people felt when they learned that I was paying eighteen dollars in order to earn a salary of nine dollars! Naturally, they thought I was crazy.

"All I can say is that I could not do anything else. I felt that I must not only work for success; but, if necessary, I must be willing to pay for it. And nine dollars seemed a small amount to pay for Opportunity!

"Just as I had hoped, Miss Wilkes soon gave me another small part; this time for two weeks. She was beginning to believe in me and to want to help me.

"I can't tell you how much I owed to Miss Wilkes. She died a few years ago;

—DIRT PER MINUTE

The accurate measure of electric cleaner efficiency is dirt per minute . . .

The HOOVER

It BEATS... as it Sweeps as it Cleans

... keeps your rugs young

POSITIVE AGITATION

IF the sharp, cutting grit that saws so determinedly through rug fibers and shortens so disastrously the life of rugs stayed on the surface, ordinary cleaning methods would remove it.

But this, the most dangerous dirt of all, sinks heavily to the bottom of the rug and clings persistently.

It takes super-cleaning to reach it. This super-cleaning you have in the Hoover. Repeated tests under actual home conditions prove that The Hoover removes more dirt per minute than any other cleaner. This dirt is made up of surface dust which ordinary cleaning methods remove and of the heavy cutting grit and lint against which these methods often fail.

"Positive Agitation" is responsible for the Hoover's ability to remove more dirt per minute. It reaches the deeply-buried dirt by the time-tried effective method—beating reduced to scientific exactness. To this exclusive cleaning principle of Positive Agitation are added sweeping and suction, with the result that the oftener your rugs are Hoover-cleaned, the longer they last, and the longer their beauty endures—due to the nap-lifting and color-restoring which "Positive Agitation" accomplishes.

We will gladly demonstrate to you in your own home that the Hoover does remove the most dirt per minute. Because d.p.m. represents the real gauge of electric cleaner capacity, you should see this test which is an accurate measure of efficiency before purchasing any cleaner. Telephone your Authorized Hoover Dealer.

Cash prices: Model 700 Hoover, $75. Model 543, $59.50. Dusting tools, $12.50. Only $6.25 down. Prices slightly higher west of the Rockies and in Canada. Hoover Dealers will make you an allowance on your old machine.

To the man whose ship never quite comes in

"WHEN my ship comes in," you say—but your smile cannot hide the worry gnawing at your heart—

A fine sea-going vessel you had thought that ship of yours when you launched it on the business ocean—

Yet the days and months and years slip by—and though others see their ships ride triumphantly to harbor, still you scan the horizon anxiously for a ship that never quite makes port.

No one's fault, perhaps—but what a misfortune that so many business ships should founder on a hidden reef or a treacherous shoal, when the channels to Success are plainly charted and a chart for every channel is available to every thinking man!

How the Right "Chart" Increased E. T. Orcutt's Income 500%

Certainly my ship-of-fortune seems far off its course, said E. T. Orcutt, in effect, when as railroad clerk at $20 a week he enrolled with LaSalle for home-study training in Traffic Management.

Before he had completed the training, however, came an opportunity with Hitchings & Co., Elizabeth, N. J., one of the largest manufacturers of greenhouses in the world.

Training had set his "ship" on the right course.

Later, as sales manager, he kept on training with LaSalle—in Business Management.

Since taking his first course, his salary has increased more than 500 per cent.

Recently he has organized his own company, capitalized at $100,000, of which he is president.

How G. W. Clason Placed His "Ship" on the Right Course

No bands were playing when G. W. Clason launched his "ship" on the business ocean.

Clason had left school at 14, and at 19 his job was to take care of the horses in the barn of a laundry.

"Never mind," said G. W. Clason, "I'll make my opportunity right where I am!"

So he learned the laundry business, and at 28 was operating his own plant. When fire wiped his business out, he started again. Unable to finance properly—thru lack of business understanding, as he testifies—he sold out and became superintendent of the Ideal Laundry Company, Spokane.

Right then he made up his mind to remedy his lack—and enrolled with LaSalle for training in Business Management.

Today, at 47, he is vice-president and a director of this successful company, and commands an income several times as large as when he started with LaSalle five years ago.

"I give all credit to my LaSalle training," writes Mr. Clason. "It has proved by far the most profitable investment I ever made."

but not before I had justified, to some extent at least, her faith in me. She was a wonderful friend.

"After several months as an usher and of having small parts in plays, I was made stage manager. Of course I had Miss Wilkes to thank for that also. The salary was only ten dollars a week; or fifteen dollars if, in addition, I had a part in the play. But it was a splendid chance for me to gain experience; and I was willing even to starve, if necessary, for the chance to learn.

"As a matter of fact, I did almost starve. But this wasn't so hard as to see my family suffer privations! That was the severest test of all.

"I knew that other stage managers in similar theatres were paid as much as thirty-five dollars a week. So after I had held my position for eight months and knew that I had become competent, I asked the manager if he couldn't possibly raise my salary. He laughed rather scornfully.

"'You ought to know,' he said, 'that plenty of boys would be glad to take your job without any salary. They would even pay me for it! If you aren't satisfied, I will get somebody else.'

"I knew that what he said was true, so I told him I would keep the position as long as I could afford to. I did keep it; but I began to look around for another job.

"THE first opening that came was at the California Theatre. I heard that Mr. Rothafel was engaging a chorus there; so I went for a try-out and was hired at the—to me—stupendous salary of thirty-five dollars a week. With that, and with what I was paid by my piano pupils, we could at least have enough to eat.

"The next thing that happened was the reappearance of Miss Morgan. She was to furnish dancers for a motion picture production; and to my surprise she sent for me. Although I was not a dancer, I went to be tested.

"As I wasn't very satisfactory, another boy was accepted instead. A few nights later, however, Miss Morgan telephoned me at the theatre, saying that this boy had proved impossible, and begging me to take his place.

"I told her I couldn't do it if it meant giving up the job I already had. But she assured me that this wouldn't be necessary, so that night, after the performance, I went to her for a rehearsal.

"Fortunately, it was more a pantomime than a dance and I was able to do it fairly well. As a result, I had several opportunities to do the same kind of thing in other pictures.

"Up to that time, I had been thinking only of the 'speaking stage,' not of the pictures. But I became more and more interested in the possibilities of the screen, and finally began going to the studios and asking for parts.

"It had been in March, 1917, that I was first hired as an extra in a motion picture studio. And it was almost exactly four years later that I was given my first part.

"It was a very small one in 'Mr. Barnes of New York,' so small that I worked with the company less than a week. But that week decided what my career was to be.

"OFTEN SO TIRED I could hardly finish the program"

Philadelphia, Pa.

"IN BUSINESS all day—then, every evening well into the night, practising with our little orchestra . . . no wonder I began to feel continually tired!

"What sleep I could get didn't seem to do me any good. My weight dropped to 112 pounds, my face lost all of its old healthy color.

"As our engagements became more frequent I was often so fagged that I wanted to drop out, but of course I had to see it through.

"This kept up till I began eating Fleischmann's Yeast. I ate a cake before each meal, and in less than three months my color had come back and my weight was again normal. Today, instead of dreading our engagements I look forward to them with pleasure."

Edward T. Brown, Jr.

FLEISCHMANN'S YEAST is a food, as fresh as the tenderest home-grown vegetables.

Easily, naturally it cleanses the intestines of poisons—softening the intestinal contents and toning up the sluggish muscles. The result is prompter, more complete elimination—improved digestion—a clearer, healthier complexion.

Fleischmann's Yeast frees you from those stubborn ills that rob life of all its joy.

Order 2 or 3 days' supply at a time from your grocer and keep in any cool dry place. Write for latest booklet on Yeast in the diet—free. Health Research Dept. J-50, The Fleischmann Company, 701 Washington St., New York.

ENJOYING HER new-found health . . . Miss Margaret Berry, in action on the basket-ball floor. She writes:

"I used to be all tired out every morning before going to school. I was nervous and irritable, and even resented the fact that I had to eat.

"And I was bothered with a breaking out of pimples on my back.

"My friend told me about Fleischmann's Yeast and, doubting, I began to eat it before every meal. Soon I began to enjoy my meals again. I now feel better in every way. And my skin is better, too."

MARGARET BERRY, Chicago, Ill.

"I HAVE BEEN a long distance runner for twenty-two years. Work hard all day, then go to the gym and run ten miles or more three times a week. When in training for a long run, as for my recent 70-mile endurance test, I eat several cakes of Fleischmann's Yeast every day around meal-time or between meals.

"I have eaten Fleischmann's Yeast for twelve years. I carry a little case that holds three cakes, and I defy anyone to catch me when I haven't got at least one with me. Fleischmann's Yeast keeps you feeling fit."

HARRY DUELL, Minneapolis, Minn.

New health, new zest in life—this easy way:

Eat three cakes of Fleischmann's Yeast regularly every day, one cake before each meal or between meals. Eat it plain, or dissolved in water (hot or cold) or any other way you like. For stubborn constipation physicians say it is best to drink one cake in a glass of hot water—not scalding—before meals and before going to bed. Train yourself to regular daily habits. Dangerous cathartics will gradually become unnecessary.

"I received one hundred dollars for the week. After that, I played the juvenile lead in the screen version of the 'Rubaiyat,' which gave me five weeks' work at seventy-five dollars a week. Next I was in 'The Prisoner of Zenda;' and, following that picture, I was given a contract at one hundred a week.

"This seemed almost unbelievable good fortune! It meant relief from privation. Best of all, it seemed to prove that I had not been chasing a will-o'-the-wisp; that I had not been cheating myself.

"A contract made it necessary for me to do one thing which was very hard. It forced me to give up my piano pupils.

"I don't suppose this would strike other people as a difficult thing. But those music lessons had stood between me and starvation for so long that I had come to having a feeling of enormous gratitude toward them. To give them up seemed like being disloyal to an old friend—a friend who had furnished even my bread and butter!

"Signing that first contract, in 1921, of course did not mean that I was a star. But I played the lead in various pictures for the next few years, including some which I thoroughly enjoyed: 'Scaramouche,' and 'Where the Pavement Ends;' and 'The Midshipman,' many of whose scenes were made at Annapolis.

"I was especially proud that I, instead of an American-born actor, had been chosen for that part. The 'foreigner,' who had been told that he could not hope to succeed in America, had succeeded!

"MY BIGGEST opportunity came when I was given the title rôle in 'Ben Hur.'

"I had wanted that rôle more than I can express. But when the director telephoned me one Sunday night, at my home in Los Angeles, and offered it to me, it all seemed too good to be true.

"We worked on the picture a year and a half; although during that time, while they were building the sets for the arena, we also did 'The Midshipman.' The scenes for the chariot races were almost the last we made; and they were the most thrilling experience I've ever had."

"Were they dangerous?" I asked.

"Yes; I suppose they were," he replied.

"Did you have someone double for you?"

He shook his head.

"No, it was too glorious a thing to miss. It gave me a feeling of fierce exultation, of escape from the petty restrictions of everyday life. It was superb."

"How did you learn to race with chariots?" I asked.

"By doing it over and over again," he said. "When we were practicing for it, a trainer rode with us. But I already knew how to manage horses, for I used to ride when I was a boy. We children often spent our vacations at my uncle's hacienda, where each of us was assigned a horse for his own special use. I still ride; and I swim and play tennis. At my home in Los Angeles, I have my own tennis courts."

"What is your home like?" I asked, thinking of the gorgeous estates on which so many movie stars spend their money.

"It's an old house which I bought and remodeled," he said; "comfortable, but not at all a show place. I don't care for

The Spirit of Service

An Advertisement of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company

IN JULY, 1926, lightning struck the Navy Arsenal at Denmark Lake, New Jersey. The explosion demolished the $80,000,000 plant, rocked the countryside, left thousands homeless and many dead. While the community fled in terror, fresh explosions hurled fragments of shell and debris far and wide.

High upon the roster of those who responded to the call of duty were the telephone workers. Operators in the danger zone stayed at their posts. Those who had left for the day and others on vacation, on their own initiative, hurried back to help handle the unprecedented volume of calls. Linemen and repairmen braved exploding shells to restore the service. Within a little over an hour emergency telephone service was established, invaluable in caring for the victims and in mobilizing forces to fight the fire which followed. In spite of repeated warnings of danger still threatening, no telephone worker left the affected area.

Through each of the day's twenty-four hours, the spirit of service is the heritage of the thousands of men and women who have made American telephone service synonymous with dependability. In every emergency, it is this spirit that causes Bell System employees to set aside all thought of personal comfort and safety and, voluntarily, risk their lives to "Get the message through."

"We feared she would be marked for life!"

"IT was at a children's party. My little Ruth was toasting marshmallows at the fire . . "Suddenly her thin dress caught, flared up like tinder. "She was saved from what might have been disaster by the timely action of the mother of one of the little girls, who put the flaming dress out with her bare hands. "Ruth had a fearful burn on her arm, and Mrs. X scorched her hand badly . . . We feared the child would be permanently scarred. But Mrs. X knew what to do. She spread Unguentine liberally on the wounds at once. "Ruth stopped crying . . . The burns healed very quickly. And best of all (I had hardly dared hope), today not a sign of a scar can be seen."

"There was a sudden burst of flame . . . a cry"

"SUCH an accident will never happen to my child," you say. Probably not. But the fact remains:—yearly, burns take their toll of thousands of little ones—in unbelievable pain, disfigurement—worse.

The smallest burn, neglected, may bring its aftermath of deadly infection. Keep Unguentine ready!

Unguentine is the famous surgical dressing used by physicians the country over. It mercifully eases the pain of a burn almost as soon as you put it on; it protects the wound, stands continually on guard against infection. Soon, normally, rapidly, the injured tissue is completely healed. Almost invariably no scar is left.

Spread Unguentine liberally on all burns, large or small: if necessary, bandage lightly. Invaluable, too, for scratches, cuts and bruises. At your druggist's—50 cents. The Norwich Pharmacal Company, Norwich, N. Y.

"ONE day last October, while I was doing some heavy pressing, my electric iron turned on its side. I was pressing with such force when my wrist hit the iron that the burn went very deep . . . The burn became terribly inflamed.

"A friend told me to use Unguentine. I got a tube and spread on a thick coat and bound with gauze. I kept this up night and morning.

"In a few days the burn was completely healed. Without a scar! I certainly do praise Unguentine.

luxury or display. They don't bring true happiness. But it is a real satisfaction to me to be able to make a home for my father and mother, and to help my brothers and sisters to get started."

"How does it happen that you've never married?" I asked.

"Well, he said, "I suppose there are several reasons. For a while, I was too poor. After that, I was too busy.

"You see, I don't feel that a man ought to marry unless he believes he can make a success of marriage. And I don't think he can make it a success unless he can give a great deal of time and thought to it.

"I mean, for instance, that I have no right to marry if I know that my work will compel me, to a very real extent, to neglect my wife. That wouldn't be fair to her. When the time comes that I am not, as it were, mortgaged to my work—"

"BUT will that time ever come?" I asked.

"Yes; if I carry out the plans I have now!" he declared with emphasis. "I've been having my voice trained by Louis Graveure, a great singer and a great teacher. My contract with Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer will expire next year. After that, I hope to make only one picture a year; a picture in which I can feel pride as a really fine production. The rest of the time I shall devote to the concert stage."

"It will mean less money for you," I suggested.

"But I don't care about money!" he exclaimed, almost impatiently.

"Then the published report that you are planning to enter a monastery was not correct?" I asked.

"I denied it before it was published," he said; "but they printed it, just the same. I can't understand how it was started; unless, possibly—"

He hesitated a moment, then went on; "When I am over-tired with work, and all the little details of life seem to become mountains, I go to a monastery near San Francisco, for what we call a 'retreat.' I see no one from outside. I do not read the newspapers. Every day I listen to short talks, or lectures, from one of the brothers. Talks about life and death; the shortness of life; the inevitableness of death; the right way to live and to prepare to die.

"Perhaps this sounds very gloomy to you. I don't find it so. It helps me to recover my sense of proportion, to realize the pettiness of the little things that have troubled me. It is a sort of spiritual house-cleaning. And I come out into the world again, feeling refreshed and reassured as to the essentials of life."

IF IT'S DARK OR CLOUDY, DON'T LET THAT CHANGE YOUR PLANS—GO RIGHT AHEAD AND MAKE THE PICTURE WITH A MODERN KODAK

PICTURES

YOU NEVER HOPED TO MAKE

Are Simple "Snap-Shots" Now

How the Modern Kodak takes the guesswork out of making pictures—multiplies the joys of photography. Why Snap-shots are easier to take than ever before

HOW often have you said to yourself, "There's a picture I'd like to make . . . but the light's too low."

How often have you waited for the rain to stop . . . or the sun to shine . . . just to get a snap-shot.

How often have you wanted to make pictures inside your house . . . of some favorite corner? Or on dark, cloudy days, of some favorite subject? Now you can!

For a remarkable new development in the making of cameras has brought a great change about.

No Handicaps Now

Please forget all of the old rules of photography. Discard all of your past ideas.

For with these new-day cameras most former handicaps have been banished completely. Amateur photography has been made simpler, surer, easier than ever before.

For example—on the $20 1A Pocket Kodak is now supplied a lens that in 1925 was not available on any camera selling for less than $40.

This means that you get a faster, better lens, for less money. A lens that makes good pictures under the most difficult conditions.

It takes the guesswork out of making pictures—opens up thousands of new photographic opportunities. Doubles the fun in taking snap-shots.

Almost Everything Automatic

The Modern Kodak is simplicity itself. Everything possible has been made automatic. Things to adjust have been reduced to a minimum.

On many Kodaks you'll find a simple "exposure guide"—a wonderful feature, created by Eastman Scientists, which practically does your thinking for you. It instantly shows you the correct speed and lens opening to suit any light conditions. Helps avoid mistakes . . . makes photography surer than ever before.

In addition, Kodak Film in the familiar yellow box is dependably uniform. It has wide latitude. Which simply means that it reduces the danger of under- and over-exposure. It gets the picture.

Get this new Free Book

At home . . . on trips . . . every day . . . there are many times you will wish you had a camera. Friends, neighbors, children. Adventure, travel, romance. There's no need now to miss a single picture-making opportunity.

The Modern Kodak will get the picture just as it is without your having to wait for the "right" time or setting.

Call on your Kodak dealer today. There's one right near you. Have him show you the Modern Kodaks. The moment you load your camera with Eastman film from the familiar yellow box you have started on a picture-taking experience full of pleasure and free from obstacles.

You start making good pictures at once, wherever and whenever they happen.

From her heart it was a cry, though on her lips it sounded like the most conventional rejoinder.

"I must go in a few days. I can't tell you what a privilege I count it to have met you, Miss MacTay. It's been—you know I'll always remember it. And to-night was sheer luck—for me. More than you can guess."

"For me too," Jane replied, wondering why her voice had to sound so cold merely because she was trying to keep a sob out of it. "But I'm going to hope we'll meet again before you leave."

That night Jane did not argue with herself. She simply looked two facts in the face with what courage she could command: Alex Tillman was the only man she had ever met to whom her heart had gone out in longing; and he had nothing more than a polite interest in her. Surprise at it all was as futile as rebellion. One didn't love by the book. Who knew what deep forces drew one heart to another? Mystery, all of it.

No, it was only another big difficulty to be accepted and fought and conquered. All her life had been full of them.

SHE rose the next morning very calm and white. For four days she worked with dogged fury. Then one noon Hunter called her up. His conversation was quite characteristic:

"Jane? Are you free for to-night? Say yes at once, or I'm a dead man! Nancy has a dinner on, and she wants you, and I told her I'd ask you last night and I forgot it, as usual. She only got the thing up yesterday. She has a Countess something or other and that highty-tighty young Englishman that's just over—the one that wrote 'Eve's Garden'—and she wants our bunch to give the thing proper tone. I'm taking Alex, to show him how the other three-quarters lives. Well, I'll tell Nancy you're coming."

"You'll do no such thing. Tell her I'm awfully sorry, but I'm working like a fiend, and I really don't see how I can, possibly."

"That's fine! I knew you would. Well, I'll be 'round for you at a quarter to seven." And he hung up.

Jane had an angry moment. She hated the way Hunter did things. He needed a lesson. She would call him up at once, and tell him plainly she was not going to that dinner. She gave his number, and then abruptly hung the receiver back on its hook. If she went she would see Alex Tillman again, perhaps talk with him.

Besides, she was fond of Nancy, Hunter's sister, and she enjoyed her parties in the big house on Long Island, which good taste barely saved from reeking too violently of wealth. Their exclusive little group often dined there. It was part of Hunter's cult to revel in extremes. Either bacon and eggs Bohemian style in Ivan's studio, or a dinner with a chaste and elegant formality at such a place as Nancy's.

Now, in the case of Alex, she was sure the dinner that night would be as little to his taste as the rather messy studio

The Stevens is the largest hotel in the world

Disturbing Noises controlled by J-M Asbestos

The clash of pots, the clatter of dishes will never disturb the guests of the Stevens Hotel. Johns-Manville Acoustical treatment has been used in the kitchens and dishwashing rooms. This control of sound is another of Johns-Manville's ingenious uses of ASBESTOS. By this method echoes and unpleasant resonance are eliminated from auditoriums of every variety, from radio broadcasting studios or business offices. Noisy work may be made less noisy and the sounds restricted. Hospital corridors and operating rooms lose their echoing hollowness, yet remain sanitary under Johns-Manville Acoustical treatment. The cost is insignificant.

56 Miles of Johns-Manville pipe insulation in the Stevens Hotel

The Stevens Hotel in Chicago faces the cold blasts that sweep over Lake Michigan. Yet every room in the Stevens, the world's largest hotel, is warm. There are 31 miles of steam pipes leading to the radiators in the Stevens. On these pipes are 31 miles of Johns-Manville Improved Asbestocel. Without such insulation it would be virtually impossible to heat so great a building, and the cost of attempting it would be enormous.

There are 25 miles of other Johns-Manville pipe insulations in the building. The various hot and cold insulations in the Stevens insure its operation at the lowest cost, yet guarantee the comfort of its guests.

The economies obtained by the use of Johns-Manville Asbestocel in many great buildings are equally important to every family. Never buy or rent a house without first making certain that its heater pipes are insulated with Johns-Manville Asbestocel. Without it an important percentage of your coal is wasted.

Johns-Manville—Master of Asbestos

To control power, to conserve heat or cold is the function of many Johns-Manville products. From the refractory cements which withstand the terrific temperatures of electric furnaces to the simple table pad for the morning coffee pot, Johns-Manville Asbestos insulations cover the whole range of heat control. For every purpose there is the proper insulation developed by years of experience, tested by uses under every condition.

In machinery and motor cars, Johns-Manville controls power through friction blocks and asbestos brake lining.

Thus the sure protection given by the 56 miles of insulation in the Stevens Hotel is but a sample of the scores of uses through which Johns-Manville Asbestos products serve industry, railroads, and homes — serve in fact the whole nation.

ASBESTOS MINERS AND MANUFACTURERS

A Unique Patented Packing. Johns-Manville Sea Ring Packing is unique. No other packing is or can be like it. Any good packing will control steam, air, water, brine and the like for a few months. Johns-Manville Sea Ring Packing lasts for years. Besides this it reduces friction to an amount that causes power savings of from 20 to 25 percent throughout its life.

Asbestos Built-Up Roofs. Johns-Manville Asbestos Built-up Roofs are the result of years of study. Famous hotels, theatres and factories use this long-lasting fireproof roofing. It has stood years of use without repair in all parts of the country. Johns-Manville Built-up Asbestos Roofs are given Class A rating by the Underwriters and secure lowest insurance rates.

meal had been. And in between was the thing her own whole nature craved—a home. Simple and natural and real. Where one might rest and live. The thought of it sent a burning ache again through her heart.

She went to her apartment early and worked there on the review all afternoon with determined, concentrated energy. Then when it was done she reread it, struck again by her own daring cleverness, and put her face in her hands and wept.

Which brings us back to the point at which we started, and to the secret of Jane MacTay.

FOR outside of the new and terrible pain of love, the old, old trouble with Jane was simply this: From a half-dozen old Scotch Covenanting forbears she had inherited a mind as keen, as profound, as masculine in quality as that of any of those old divines who had spent their lives pursuing theology and logic; but along with it—Heaven help her!—she had inherited the heart of the little Irish grandmother who had left an earl waiting at the church while she rode blithely over the borders and away with the impecunious young man of her choice.

Now there was a heritage to give any woman trouble! And it had certainly done no less to Jane. For, whi e she was all the time acutely aware of that Irish heart in her bosom, from the outside, people seemed to see in her only the deadly mentality of those relentless old Scotchmen. It began away back in school days. She had solved all the hard problems for the boys as well as the girls. But for her guerdon, she saw all the budding, half-ashamed male gallantries go to the little fluffy heads who "simply couldn't understand arithmetic."

In college she had taken all possible honors; and sat up in her room on dance nights in a bitterness of longing as the dreamy waltz strains floated up—shut out because she didn t know a single young man well enough to ask him as her guest.

When college was over, she had come to grips with life suddenly. Double home sorrows left her alone, with her way to make. She got a job as reporter on a city paper.

There followed a long, hard struggle. She had to fight, to match her wits against the men who worked beside her. And because she won, continuously, through sheer braininess, they respected her; but they didn't like her. No man likes to be beaten by a woman at a game he should know best.

When first youth was over, and Jane emerged into full-blossomed womanhood, a new poise and assurance fell upon her. She was at the top now. She knew her own strength as well as that inner weakness which no one guessed. She could command open admiration now, if not love. She began to dress more carefully. People said Miss MacTay was beautiful, but cold.

There had even been offers of marriage. Once, a diplomat, whom she had come to know through being sent to interview him, had grown quite serious:

"With your mind, Miss MacTay, you could be of inestimable help to me as my wife."

Jane had flung herself out of the room where they were dining, leaving the gentleman, who felt he had done her a great honor, somewhat dazed.

It was all running through Jane's mind now in a hopeless summary as she sat crying her heart out. The night Ivan had come, quite earnestly, to suggest that they be married as some of his friends were doing: Keep their own apartments, meeting frequently just when they felt that they would react best on each other's work.

"You know, Jane, if I could have the stimulus of your companionship whenever I needed it, I feel I could produce a masterpiece. I have the soul, but you have the intellect. It would stir me up, set me going. . . ."

"And suppose I turned out to have a soul too. That would upset all the calculations!" Jane had told him acidly.

And then Hunter.

She could see him, as he had stood one evening in negligent grace before her tiny mantel.

"Has it ever occurred to you, Jane, that it would be a highly sensible thing for us to marry? We would get on each other's nerves less than most of the husbands and wives I observe. We are interested in the same things, know the same people, could go on with our work as usual. Don't you think the idea is worth considering?"

"I do not," Jane had answered promptly.

Hunter had made a slight gesture with his cigarette.

"Very well. That's a bona fide proposal, none the less, even though I haven't exactly swept you off your feet by the breath of my passion. However, I fancy you don't care much for that kind of heroics. Well, no harm done by merely making the suggestion, is there?"

All quite casual, light, urbane. Just like Hunter.

BUT in Jane's heart there was left from all these unamorous encounters a hurt which she tried to bury under layers of pride. It seemed that nothing about her mattered to people but her mind. No one, and, bitterest of all, no man, ever seemed to see below it to the heart and soul of her. No one, until Alex Tillman had looked deeply into her eyes and spoken to her as to a woman.

And now, with all the vague longing of the years sharpened to a rapier point, she had to turn it back into her own heart. She had just glimpsed the Valley of Delight; now she must keep on climbing her lonely height as usual.

When the sobs subsided, she bathed her face, and wondered, as she began to dress, whether the redness would be gone from her eyes by the dinner hour. She decided on a white lace gown and on one short string of the tiniest pearl beads for ornament.

She spent more time than usual over her toilet. She arranged her dark hair in a little softer fashion. She wondered how so many women of all ages managed to look so helpless and fragile and appealing. Her own eyes always looked out at the world with a straightforward glance.

When she had done her best, she admitted she looked rather lovely. But she sighed as she gave herself that much grace.

The whole matter of Alex Tillman for her

P.A. is so downright dependable

THAT'S one of the things that holds me to this faithful old brand. You can pack it for a trip to the wilds or a cruise around the Horn, without once wishing that you had brought some other brand along. Wherever you may be, P.A. is always the same—and always good!

As you open the tidy red tin, inhale that fine, fresh, stimulating aroma. Notice that P.A. is equally friendly as you smoke it . . . fragrant and cool and mellow and mild . . . just about everything a fellow could ask in a smoke. You never tire of tobacco like Prince Albert.

Is it any wonder that P.A. is known as the National Joy Smoke from coast to coast? Is it any wonder that pipe-smokers buy more P.A. than any other brand? If you can't answer "No" right off the bat, try a load of long-burning P.A. in your pipe. Then you'll know for yourself why P.A. is so downright dependable, so thoroughly enjoyable.

Better quality and larger quantity—there are TWO full ounces in every tin.

Do You Make these Mistakes in ENGLISH?

Free yourself of embarrassing mistakes in speaking and writing. Wonderful new invention automatically finds and corrects your mistakes; gives you a powerful mastery of language in only 15 minutes a day.

SHERWIN CODY

Many persons say "Did you hear from him today?" They should say, "Have you heard from him today?" Some spell calendar "calender" or "calander." Still others say "between you and I" instead of "between you and me." It is astonishing how often "who" is used for "whom" and how frequently the simplest words are mispronounced. Few know whether to spell certain words with one or two "c's" or "m's" or "r's," or with "ie" or "ei." Most persons use only common words—colorless, flat, ordinary. Their speech and their letters are lifeless, monotonous, humdrum. Every time they talk or write they show themselves lacking in the essential points of English.

Every time you talk, every time you write, you show what you are. When you use the wrong word, when you mispronounce a word, when you punctuate incorrectly, when you use flat, ordinary words, you handicap yourself enormously. A striking command of English enables you to present your ideas clearly, forcefully, convincingly. If your language is incorrect it hurts you more than you will ever know, for people are too polite to tell you about your mistakes.

Wonderful New Invention

For many years Mr. Cody studied the problem of creating instinctive habits of using good English. After countless experiments he finally invented a simple method by which you can acquire a better command of the English language in only 15 minutes a day. Now you can stop making the mistakes which have been hurting you. Mr. Cody's students have secured more improvement in five weeks than previously had been obtained by other pupils in two years!

Learn by Habit—Not by Rules

Under old methods rules are memorized, but correct habits are not formed. Finally the rules themselves are forgotten. The new Sherwin Cody method provides for the formation of correct habits by constantly calling attention only to the mistakes you yourself make—and then showing you the right way, without asking you to memorize any rules.

One of the wonderful things about Mr. Cody's course is the speed with which these habit-forming practice drills can be carried out. You can write the answers to fifty questions in 15 minutes and correct your work in 5 minutes more. The drudgery and work of copying have been ended by Mr. Cody! You concentrate always on your own mistakes until it becomes "second nature" to speak and write correctly.

FREE BOOK ON ENGLISH

A command of polished and effective English denotes education and culture. It wins friends and makes a favorable impression upon those with whom you come in contact. In business as well as in social life correct English gives you added advantages and better opportunities, while poor English handicaps you more than you now realize. And now, in only 15 minutes a day—in your own home—you can actually see yourself improve by using the 100% self-correcting method.

A new book explaining Mr. Cody's remarkable method is ready. If you are ever embarrassed by mistakes in grammar, spelling, punctuation, pronunciation, or if you can not instantly command the exact words with which to express your ideas, this new free book, "How to Speak and Write Masterly English," will prove a revelation to you. was ended. She must remind herself often of that.

When she answered the ring at a quarter to seven Hunter was there alone.

"I sent Alex down for Joyce. I thought maybe he had bored you enough the other night. Best chap in the world, Alex, but not just an inspired conversationalist."

"I believe I hate you sometimes, Hunter," Jane stated with apparent irrelevance.

"Quite likely," Hunter agreed imperturbably. "Anything from a lady but indifference!"

He spent the time on the way out discussing the reasons why Jane should try play-writing.

JANE did not even see Alex until they were going out to dinner. She had been swept into a small whirlpool of discussion in one corner of the big drawing-room, and kept there during the few minutes they waited for late guests to arrive.

But once at the table between the young English novelist and a Mr. De Voe, who was rather renowned himself in the world of letters, Jane saw Alex almost across from her, with Joyce West handing him small crumbs of her sprightly discourse. He looked up, and they nodded a greeting.

Then the Englishman turned to her, and the talk was on, brilliant, scintillating, as ever. But in a moment's pause which followed their discussion of the place of realism in modern literature, Jane heard the conversation across from her.

"How long are you staying in this city of iniquity, Mr. Tillman?" from Joyce.

"I'm leaving to-morrow, Miss West."

"What, so soon?"

"Well, you see I've got a farm. And while my head overseer is mighty good in lots of ways, he's always careless about the young lambs. Last year I lost eight. So I feel better to be down there looking after them a little."

He raised his eyes at that moment and found Jane's looking at him. And suddenly, without any warning, a great wave of color surged into her face. A hot, furious blush, such as she had not known since early girlhood. She looked at her plate, cruelly embarrassed. The men beside her were each busy for the moment. She felt the warmth in her cheeks subsiding. But when she raised her eyes again, Alex's were still upon her with a deep, questioning intentness.

She tossed a light comment across to Joyce, and then turned to the young Englishman as a haven. But her answers were somewhat random. She was terrified at herself. Her self-control was gone. She felt that any moment she might again burst into tears. The afternoon's breakdown was not over.

When Nancy gave the signal to rise, Jane had only one thought: She had to get away somewhere, quickly, before she was disgraced.

She loitered behind the other women. Then, catching up somebody's scarf from a chair in the wide hallway, she made her escape through the French doors at the rear and was out in the warm-cool darkness of the garden. In a moment she could see her way along the walk to a seat under one of the trees. She sank down upon it, trembling. In a few minutes she would have herself pulled together and be ready to go back.

The whole trouble was nerves. She had been thinking too much about herself. But he was leaving to-morrow! Her face was in her hands. Her shoulders shaking. What would they think if she went in with eyes red and swollen? What did it matter what anyone thought!

There was a soft sound of steps on the grass. Then someone bent over her. She knew, without looking up. She knew in the darkness. For the same strange feeling of utter peace, of having come home, crept over her.

"Miss MacTay! What are you doing out here all alone? You're in trouble. Tell me. Can't I help you?"

He sat down beside her. It could not be said that he took her in his arms, but somehow his arms were about her. She was very gently but surely drawn close to him. His voice was low and husky:

"I know you'll think I'm a madman; but I can't help it. From the moment I met you, I've loved you. I said to myself, 'Here is the woman I've been looking for all these years!' Then, when I heard how brilliant you are and how famous, how could I tell you? I have nothing like that to offer you. I'm the most ordinary fellow in the world. But somehow to see you weeping here all alone in the dark has made me brave. Brave enough to tell you that I want you . . . as I've never wanted anything in my life before! Jane, now since I've been fool enough to tell you . . . I can't give you up!"

He was breathing hard. He drew her closer and, without waiting for an answer, he kissed her in no uncertain fashion.

When he raised his head, he spoke with an awed sort of triumph.

"Jane, you let me do that!"

And Jane laughed, oh, so tenderly.

"Let you! How could I have helped myself! But, Alex, I didn't want to help myself. I've been yours since I first saw you!"

And with that, the little Irish grandmother in her took her place forever in the ascendancy.

A few minutes later Alex asked tensely: "When will you marry me, Jane? Oh sweetheart, make it soon!"

"To-morrow?" Jane whispered.

She felt the man start.

"Do you mean that?"

And then her arms suddenly reached up to him. Her fine, capable hands curled themselves tenderly about his neck, as though that was their only possible destiny.

"Oh, take me with you, to-morrow," she begged. "I can't stay behind you. And, besides, I want to help you take care of those little new lambs!"

BACK in the big drawing-room, the young Englishman spoke to Mr. De Voe:

"Brilliant person, that Miss MacTay! But, you know, she struck me as rather coldly analytical for a woman."

"Oh, that's the trouble with these women that run all to brains," Mr. De Voe agreed. "They're hard. Hard as nails."

And they turned to pronounce infallible judgments upon other matters.

Listen! Whole wheat, cooked, drawn out into filmy-thin ribbons of fine-spun wheaten threads. Three whole yards of this ribbon wound round and round, layer upon layer, to muffin size and shape. Baked. Toasted butternut brown.

Light as a crumpet. Crisp as potato chips. Crunchy! Crumbles in the mouth. That's what a Muffet is!

You eat one for breakfast —with sugar and cream, or with fruit added—fresh-sliced, stewed or preserved.

You get vitamins, calories, roughage (bran), easy digestibility — all the health properties you'd naturally expect in whole wheat—and something mighty good to eat!

Is there any wonder people are saying that we've given them the first really new breakfast dish in a generation?

And just think! You can still be the discoverer of them for your home! My, my! We envy you! The Quaker Oats Co., Chicago.

That Tired Feeling—And How to Get Rid of It

"As a consequence of these great discoveries, we now know beyond all doubt or controversy that in order to keep healthy and efficient and cure that tired feeling, the alkali reserve must at all times be well maintained. Work has little to do with the tired feeling caused by low alkali reserve. Rest in many cases may even make the tired person worse, by increasing poor elimination.

"THE tired man's salvation lies in a diet in which vegetables and fruits are given preference.

"Many tired, run-down, nervous people resort to taking raw eggs to build them up. There is hardly anything worse than raw eggs for anybody. Raw egg albumen is very hard to digest, and often putrefies in the intestines. It digests better if cooked, but should be thoroughly masticated. White of egg, any way, is poor food. It lacks iron, lime, vitamins and almost everything else essential to a complete food except the one element, protein. Its use is to form the body of the young chick and not to supply it with food. Egg yolk, on the other hand, is a natural food-stuff, rich in lime, iron and vitamins—everything the young chick needs until it emerges from the shell. It is, besides, very easily digested.

"I remember a man some years ago whose blood pressure was 260—a man of fifty, who was such a physical wreck that he had closed his business, never expecting to be able to work again. After living on a basic diet for three months his blood pressure had dropped to 160, and he was so well and eager for work that he went back into business. Seven years afterward he came back for a check-up, and his blood pressure was still 160, and he was feeling fine.

"Not long ago we had here the famous swimmer, Johnny Weismuller, who holds the world's 300-meter record and has broken over fifty world's records. I suggested to his trainer, William Bachrach, physical director of the Illinois Athletic Club, that we try our diet on him and have a test in our swimming pool. We put him on a basic diet and gave him plenty of bulky foodstuffs to keep his bowels active, and also gave him foods that would cleanse his intestines of putrefactive bacteria. Johnny discovered that he had broken his own 300-meter world record, which had stood for two years, by four and three-fifths seconds.

"Several years ago Professor Irving Fisher, the eminent economist of Yale University, pitted a group of our untrained men nurses and doctors against the trained Yale athletes in a series of endurance tests. Our nurses and doctors, without any preparation except their ordinary healthy, biologic living, put it all over the Yale men in every contest. In one test, that of holding the arms out, fifteen of our men made an average of 90 minutes, while the fifteen Yale athletes averaged only 11 minutes. You see, strength and endurance are two wholly different things. Strength depends upon size of muscle, but endurance depends upon the state of the blood. And for great endurance the blood must be normally alkaline.

"Muscle work produces lactic acid, and this produces fatigue and exhaustion. A basic diet helps to counteract this lactic acid."

"But, Doctor Kellogg," I remarked, "your tired business man claims it is the rush of American life which raises his blood pressure and wears him out."

"Popular moonshine," ejaculated the doctor. "People who hustle and work hard have lower blood pressure and healthier arteries, kidneys, and livers than people who live idle or sedentary lives. A man's blood pressure is high while he is rushing and is vigorously active, of course; but it quickly subsides to normal after the strain is over. People who are tired because of the flood of acid toxins always circulating in their blood vessels get high blood pressure through the irritating effects of these poisons on the walls of the blood vessels.

"A diet in which acid-producing foods predominate, and neglect of the colon, of which I shall speak later, are probably the two greatest causes of premature old age.

"THE second great line of relief from that chronic tired feeling is in maintaining the proper ratio of protein in the daily ration.

"The proper protein ration, according to the 'Chittenden Standard,' which revolutionized the ideas of the entire medical profession on this subject, requires about 1.3 calories of protein per day, per pound of body weight. By this standard, if you weigh 150 pounds, you should eat about 200 calories or 1½ ounces of protein per day, and no more.

"You would get this amount of protein from 3½ pints of milk, or 8 ounces of porterhouse steak, or 9½ eggs, or 8 ounces of ordinary beans or peas, or 4½ ounces of soy beans, or 8½ ounces of almonds, or 7 ounces of peanuts, or 9½ ounces of walnuts.

"But, of course, no one would ever need to eat such large quantities of these foods, for the reason that most foods contain more or less protein, so that all the protein may be supplied in bread, cereals, and other foods which are only moderately rich in protein.

Pipe Lover Finally Discovers Tobacco Satisfaction

Everlastingly trying brings success, even in finding the right tobacco. Mr. Gaw's experiences prove that. He tried more than ten different brands of smoking tobacco, paid high prices, only to suffer the pangs of dissatisfaction. Finally he concentrated on Edgeworth, and it was then that he achieved true pipe-enjoyment. Read what he says about it:

Philadelphia, Pa.
Sept. 21, 1927

Larus & Bro. Co.
Richmond, Va.
Gentlemen:

I write you this complimentary letter because I feel that if any one tobacco company deserves praise for its products, it is your company.

During the two years that I have been a pipe smoker I have used more than one—in fact more than ten—different tobaccos. I have even invested as much as one dollar and twenty-five cents for a half pound of a well-known mixture, trying to find satisfaction in price; but it was all in vain. After the first few pipe-loads I readily discovered that even price and a reputation couldn't supply that bit of satisfaction that my pipe and myself crave.

I had no other choice, so it seems, but to return to the most satisfactory pipe tobacco that I have ever experienced. That tobacco is none other than the Edgeworth tobacco.

Now the pangs of dissatisfaction and grief over exorbitant prices have entirely disappeared since I've concentrated my pipe smoking on Edgeworth.

I am taking this means of thanking you for curing my pipe ills as well as putting my mind at ease now that I have tobacco that satisfies pipe as well as man.

Your ardent well-wisher,
Samuel Gaw

There seem to be a lot of men who have an unsatisfied smoke-yearning. But those who persevere until they discover Edgeworth seem to be so satisfied that they want to tell the whole wide world about its goodness.

To those who have never tried Edgeworth, we make this offer:

Let us send you free samples of Edgeworth so that you may put it to the pipe test. If you like the samples, you'll like Edgeworth wherever and whenever you buy it, for it never changes in quality.

Write your name and address to Larus & Brother Company, 3 S. 21st Street, Richmond, Va.

Edgeworth is sold in various sizes to suit the needs and means of all purchasers. Both Edgeworth Plug Slice and Edgeworth Ready-Rubbed are packed in small, pocket-size packages, in handsome humidors holding a pound, and also in several handy in-between sizes.

On your radio—tune in on WRVA, Richmond, Va.—the Edgeworth Station. Wave length 254.1 meters. Frequency 1180 kilocycles.

"Moreover, not all of the proteins in these various foods are equally high in quality. The protein of milk and that of soy beans and some of the nuts, such as almonds and peanuts, are of very superior quality. The proteins of meats have the disadvantage of being accompanied by putrefactive bacteria, which in time tend to injure the colon and lead in some cases to auto-intoxication, high blood pressure and other disorders, unless counteracted by close attention to a balanced diet.

"Unfortunately, your tired business man often eats three or four times the proper ration of protein in steaks and chops alone. Then he thinks nothing of eating two or three eggs, drinking a pint or two of milk, and he often adds to his meat diet a plate of beans, a helping or two of peas, and possibly a nut sundae.

"Now, nature has provided no place to store this excess protein. It simply clogs the tissues and overworks the liver and kidneys. In addition, unless the residue is promptly expelled when it reaches the colon, it putrefies, and throws more acids into the blood stream. The body can store up fats and carbohydrates as adipose tissues; but proteins can be used only as repair material. Hence, most of this surplus protein eaten daily, instead of being assimilated, has to be converted into urea, and other waste products.

"When the blood, therefore, is overloaded with these waste products, the vital machinery is clogged, the brain and muscles are inefficient and have little endurance, and a person is always tired."

AT THIS point I put this question to the doctor: "Would fasting do your tired man any good?"

"No," he replied emphatically; "people who fast are not going without food, as they think. They are consuming themselves. They are living on an exclusive meat diet; namely, their own flesh. The effect of fasting is not to purify the body and blood, but the very opposite. Chemical examination of the urine of the famous Italian faster, Cetti, showed the presence of carbolic acid in the urine from the very beginning of his fasting, and the quantity increased from day to day due to increasing putrefaction in the colon."

"But what about people who wish to reduce?" I asked.

"People who want to reduce should eat good, full meals like sensible people," said the doctor. "Their diet, however, should be low in fats and carbohydrates, but at the same time rich in iron, lime, and vitamins. They should eat cereals very sparingly and without sugar or cream. They should eat liberal quantities of spinach, carrots, beets, string beans, cabbage, lettuce, celery, and an abundance of fruits, especially melons. A reducing diet need not involve any hardship. Satisfaction in eating, that is, a sense of satiety, is felt when the stomach is well filled; hence a reducing diet should consist chiefly of bulky foodstuffs that have low nutritive value.

"Lean people who desire to gain weight need the reverse of the reducing diet, and often are benefited by special fattening foods.

"Another potent cause that makes the tired business man tired is intestinal stasis or chronic constipation.

"By the use of proper foods, such as dates, raisins, bulky vegetables and the like, accompanied by proper exercises, a satisfactory elimination can be maintained. Three daily movements seem a natural number, and they can do no possible injury, provided the movements are brought about naturally.

"The colon in many persons has been so crippled by long abuse that it takes some time to train it properly, and sometimes hot enemas are necessary for a period. Fortunately, the hot enema can be used indefinitely, provided care is taken to avoid too large quantities of water. The amount should never exceed two quarts, and the water should be heated to 100° or 112° Fahrenheit.

"Another most effective measure for relieving tired and nervous people is changing the bacterial flora of the intestines.

"Some of our foods, particularly game and 'high' meats, are practically always infected with Welch's bacillus, a micro-organism. It produces great quantities of gas, and highly virulent toxins. The poisons produced by Welch's bacillus, when absorbed, give rise to nervousness, headaches and tired feelings, and numerous other symptoms.

"Changing the intestinal flora is simply getting rid of these pernicious bacteria, and restoring the normal, acid-forming bacteria known as acidophilus which protect the intestines from typhoid and other harmful bacteria.

"The basic fact upon which the successful methods of changing the intestinal flora rests is that the putrefactive or poison-producing Welch bacillus and others cannot grow in the presence of acids.

"Now, the acidophilus germ is a friendly germ and grows normally in the intestines. With proper encouragement, it will develop in the colon in such numbers as to prevent putrefaction and the poisoning that results therefrom.

"The protective influence of acid-forming germs in the intestines is clearly shown by a simple experiment. I kept a piece of beefsteak in a jar of sour milk without a taint of putrefaction for seventeen years. But, unfortunately, the sour-milk germ needs oxygen and, therefore, will not grow freely in the intestines.

"A glass or two of acidophilus milk, taken daily, if found agreeable, will slightly hasten the change in the intestinal flora; but it should be avoided in cases of colitis. Lactose or lacto-dextrin will also hasten the change.

"TWO of the greatest boons that God has given mankind are sunlight and fresh air, and they are two of the hardest things to induce people to utilize.

"We have been using artificial sunshine and ultra-violet rays here at Battle Creek for many years, with most gratifying success.

"We also maintain two large outdoor gymnasia, one for men and one for women, where scores of our patients in fair weather bathe in the sunshine, and also a sunshine playground for children.

"New revelations are being made as to the effect of ultra-violet, as well as of other sunshine rays. It is a sovereign remedy for the rickets of infancy. Even exposing foods to ultra-violet rays produces vitamin D in them, and you can

On Time—and Arrived Safely

Firestone Gum-Dipped Balloons are built with many features of safety and dependability which women especially appreciate for hurried trips in bad weather. The riding on Firestone Tires is relaxed and care-free. No anxious tension: no strain on the nerves. In crowded traffic or bad corners you can start or stop instantly. For slippery places you can depend on the non-skid tread.

The Mark of Quality

Firestone Balloon Tires are made extra strong and flexible by Gum-Dipping which saturates every fiber of every cord in a rubber solution. This special Firestone process adds thousands of miles to tire wear and gives added luxury in riding.

The Firestone Dealer keeps up-to-date on all tire problems and is prepared to give you expert service or advice at any time.

BERRY'S BRUSHING LACQUER

It's child's play to make ....
....old things beautiful

Fill your brush with Berry's rich, smooth-flowing lacquer.* Experience the thrill of seeing ugly things grow beautiful and old ones become modern.

It's a joy to use a finish like this. You accomplish in an hour what once required days and weeks.

Just flow it on any clean, smooth surface. Allow it to level naturally, free from sags and brush marks. When you are through it is dry—ready to give years of service.

Berry's Brushing Lacquer is suited for use on furniture, woodwork, floors, linoleum and countless other things. It won't turn white. Heat and water do not affect it. "Printing" never occurs. And like all other finishes made by Berry Brothers, it wears.

Dealers who do not have Berry's Brushing Lacquer can obtain it for you quickly—if you insist. It pays to demand what you want.

*Colors available include: Chinese red, jade green, turquoise blue, French gray, coral pink, ivory, etc.

SPECIAL HALF-PRICE TRIAL OFFER

actually swallow the sunlight in this way.

"Ordinary window glass cuts out nearly all the ultra-violet rays. Several types of glass have now been invented which admit the ultra-violet rays.

"We must also learn to wear light-colored and porous clothing, so as to permit the rays of light to reach the skin constantly.

"Another thing that would greatly benefit the tired man would be to learn to sit erect in his chair, with a support or cushion behind his back, his abdomen drawn in, his shoulders relaxed and his chest well up. Sitting all crumpled up, compressing the vital organs all day, overloading the liver circulation, and limiting deep breathing, are national sins. I have seen wonderful transformations worked on tired, down-and-out men and women merely by correcting their bad posture.

"AGAIN, factories and offices are too hot and too dry and not half ventilated. A temperature of 68°, with a humidity of about 70 has been found to be the best temperature for both mental and physical work. If this temperature is not comfortable, more clothes are needed. The air should always be in motion. Stagnant air prevents evaporation and elimination from the skin and is depressing. Moving air keeps the skin active, and freshens both body and mind. I do not mean a draft. That is dargerous. I mean air moving six to ten feet per second. An electric fan is a great help, if you cannot do better.

"Then, too, your tired man is often tired from lack of exercise. He shou'd do his daily setting-up exercises, and get in a good brisk two- to five-mile wa'k every day as a matter of religion. Especially should he employ plenty of stooping and bending exercises.

"Finally, various kinds of baths, which you can take just as well at home as in the finest sanitarium, are of prime value. Scarcely one person in a thousand knows how to take a bath properly. Prolonged hot baths are often weakening and should be taken only under expert guidance. A short hot bath, followed by a cold dash, is invigorating. A cold bath is a fine tonic. This does not mean that weak, nervous, or old people, should plunge into a tub of cold water or take a cold shower. Delicate persons should take cold rubs, rubbing each part till dry and warm before proceeding to the next.

"But one of the best baths for the tired, nervous, sleepless person, is the neutral bath. The water should be between 92° and 95° degrees, inclusive. Above 95° the pores open wide and the heat causes perspiration; below 92° the cold stimulates. Between these temperatures there are no thermic effects and the body soaks up water like a sponge. The water soothes the nerves and washes out the fatigue poisons. For nervous and tired people it is the most restful thing known, and for promoting sleep it is better than any sleeping powders made. Often twenty minutes in the tub before retiring will give a tired, nervous man or woman a restful night's sleep. In getting out of the bath, avoid the slightest chilling. Dry quickly, and get into bed at once, and you will probably quickly fall into a sound, refreshing slumber.

that Comparisons are Impossible

FRANKLY, The Victory has left current practice so far behind that comparisons are impossible.

Conservative drivers will never really discover the car's astonishing resources.

They will delight in its pick-up and low gas needs — its comfort and streamline beauty.

But the magnificent, all-day speed of the car — its faultless smoothness over clods and cobbles — are thrills that await the adventurer!

Six powerful cylinders are six powerful reasons for this. A seventh vital reason is the basic Victory idea!

For the first time in motor car history, chassis and body are a unit. Floor and seats are built in the chassis. The wide Victory chassis frame replaces the customary body sill — and eliminates the customary body over-hang. The body itself has only 8 major parts!

The result is 175 less pounds, 330 less parts; standard road and head clearance, yet a car that is extremely low, steady and safe — with a power plant stripped for instant and brilliant action!

And the smartest car at the price ever created!

CHAMPION blazed the way to better engine performance

Anticipating engineering demands, Champion's persistent research has resulted in a vastly improved spark plug

Champion is now ready to inform the public about its most recent and far-reaching improvements in Champion Spark Plugs

The plain truth is that without this remarkable Champion progress, you probably would not be enjoying the vastly improved motor car performance which you do enjoy today.

Today, but for Champion's painstaking work in laboratory and shop, the high-speed, high-compression engine might still remain a future development.

In other words, the faster pick-up, the sustained speed, the cleaner performance in every way, which motorists today enjoy, is greatly dependent on improved spark plugs.

Sillimanite, from which Champion insulators are made, was first produced synthetically in Champion laboratories. Then Champion scientists searched the world until they discovered the only known commercial supply of this exceedingly rare mineral.

CHAMPION'S Outstanding Improvements

A remarkable new glaze on the exclusive sillimanite insulator, which prevents loss of current by resisting carbon formation.

Advanced method of heat treating insulator to withstand the terrifically increased temperatures of today's high-compression engines.

New compression-tight patented gasket seal for two-piece construction that holds absolutely gas-tight under the higher compression of the modern engine.

Improved special-analysis electrodes which provide permanently fixed spark-gap, resist pitting and burning most effectively, and are far more efficient in all operating conditions.

To these wonderful natural qualities, Champion ceramic scientists have added a structure which resists to the utmost the tremendous stress of modern engines and have protected this structure with a remarkable new glaze which prevents loss of current by resisting carbon formation.

This certainty of complete insulation insures proper sparking efficiency at all engine speeds — with sweet-running, superb climbing ability, lightning pick-up and easy idling.

Better engine operation and full power development are further assured by Champion two-piece construction, with its new patented gasket seal that holds absolutely gas-tight under the much higher compression of today's engines.

Through further scientific research, Champion developed the formula for special-analysis electrodes which not only resist pitting and burning, but provided a fixed spark-gap which gives positive and efficient engine operation at all speeds.

All of these remarkable developments in spark plug design and manufacture make the Champions of today by far the most highly perfected product in Champion history.

To all car owners Champion says, in all sincerity, that Champion superiorities are so pronounced as to warrant immediate equipment with the new Champions, no matter what spark plug you may be using now.

Champion further says that although Champions give better service for a longer period than any other spark plug, even Champions should be changed if they have been in service 10,000 miles, in order to maintain the high level of economy and performance which was built into the engine.

Houdini—The Master Magician

came up there was solid ice above me, and I couldn't locate the hole. I went down again and looked, and I swam about under water a little, but that confounded hole had vanished as if it had suddenly frozen over—and, after a little, I began to need air. That bothered me; but I got an idea. I let myself come up gently, and, sure enough, my idea was a good one. Between the surface of the water and the under surface of the ice was a little air space, about half an inch wide. By lying on my back and poking my nose into this gently, I could fill my lungs.

"Of course this wasn't too easy. If I drew in water with the air I'd take to choking, and then—well, I didn't think about it. I'd get a little air, and then navigate around a bit looking for that hole, and then I'd have to get another breath. I couldn't see much, anyway, and it wasn't so warm down there.

"After what seemed about an hour, I saw the rope flash into the water, not very far away, and you bet I made for it. That was that."

SOMETIMES, in rare moments of confidence, Houdini would give an intimate friend a fleeting glimpse of his technique. Late one afternoon, at the office of his attorney, some months before Houdini's last illness, in the interval of waiting for some legal papers, the talk turned on the opening of safes, and the lawyer asked if it was really true that Houdini could open any safe.

"Yes," said Houdini. "If everyone knew what I know about safes, safes wouldn't be worth very much. I sometimes wonder at the possible consequences if a clever hypnotist should get hold of me, dig out my secrets about safes, and pass them on to persons in the underworld. But it is a remote danger. I don't believe they would know how to apply the secrets, even if they heard them.

"When I was a youngster in petticoats, locks had a fascination for me. As I grew up I worked with various locksmiths. The study of locks led to the study of all sorts of locking appliances. In this connection, I took up physics, even dipped into chemistry a bit. You know, five hours is a full night's sleep for me. I can do with less. It's remarkable what a lot of work a fellow can get done during those three extra hours while the rest of the world is in bed. It's nearly eleven hundred extra hours a year. Maybe that's one of the reasons I am 'The Great Houdini' instead of a side-show piker."

"Can you open our office safe?" asked the lawyer presently.

"If you give me three minutes alone with it, I'll try," said Houdini. "But first let's make sure it's locked. It isn't any trick to open a safe that isn't locked."

The safe was a large one, such as is used as a repository for wills and other precious papers in a big law office. It had been locked for the night. The lawyer left Houdini in front of it, and retired to his private office. In a few minutes Houdini

"Do you think it pays to put so much money into your tires, Frank?"
"What do you mean?"
"Why, there are a lot of good tires that won't cost you as much as you paid for those Kellys."
"Not good tires. Any of the better-known makes will cost you the same price as a Kelly-Springfield."

"Cheap" paint will never fool Jim Stewart again

He, like thousands of others now knows that "You can't paint a house with apple sauce"

IN every town and city—even on the farms—you will find "Jim Stewart." There are thousands and thousands of him. He typifies the man who has found out that "cheap" paint isn't cheap at all.

Last fall the particular "Jim Stewart" we have in mind found it necessary to repaint his house AGAIN. He decided to see just what there was to this rumpus about "cheap" paint.

So he bought $46.75 worth of fine old SWP House Paint from his local Sherwin-Williams dealer. A short while later he returned with $17.00 worth of the paint. And this is what he said:

"I never in my life saw anything cover like this SWP. I figured this job on the same covering basis as the brand I have been using and I had almost half of the SWP left over."

Is "Jim Stewart" converted? He is. Will a "cheap" house paint or any other "cheap" paint product ever fool him again? It will not.

If you are tempted by the "low price," the wonderful claims and eloquent promises of a "cheap" house paint, remember this:

"Cheap" paint is low priced for one reason only. It is cheaply made of cheap materials. Look at the formula. SWP House Paint, on the other hand, is a strictly quality paint. It costs more per gallon, because it is made of finest materials.

The white lead carbonate, white lead sulphate, zinc oxide, linseed oil and even the beautiful colors used in SWP are all made by Sherwin-Williams.

We could buy these materials on the open market, usually at less cost. But we could not control the superfine quality demanded by Sherwin-Williams.

As a result of these extra fine materials, and the famous Sherwin-Williams "balanced" formula, SWP House Paint covers 360 square feet per gallon (2 coats).

The average "cheap" paint, for obvious reasons, covers only 250 square feet per gallon (2 coats).

Where 11 gallons of "cheap" paint are needed for the average house only 7 gallons of SWP are needed.

Also, "cheap" paint and cheap colors have no stamina. Your cheap-looking "cheap" paint quickly fades,

Up-to-date painters everywhere are using SWP House Paint. They realize that its beautiful colors—creamy smoothness — brushing ease —covering ability—and durability—can only be produced by scientific processes.

discolors, cracks, peels and chips. About two years sees its finish.

SWP House Paint, made of finest materials, with beautiful, sunfast and weatherproof colors, lasts on the average for five years—and it looks rich to the very end. This is vitally important today—when even our houses are radiant with color.

So there you have it. "Cheap" paint, with cheap, wishy-washy colors, actually costs you two and one half times as much as fine old SWP. And there is no earthly way to beat it.

The "Master Touch"

Often the question is asked, "Why is it that others do not make a house paint to equal SWP?" The answer is, "The Master Touch prevents it."

At the head of our great laboratories we have paint scientists who are in the paint industry what men like Thomas Edison and Marconi are in their chosen fields. These men have that rare plus-ability—the "Master Touch"—which lifts the great artist or scientist high above all others.

The "Master Touch" shows in the superfine quality of materials made by Sherwin-Williams—in the delicate, scientific "balancing" of ingredients—in the great, power-driven mills and grinders which produce the creamy-smooth SWP texture—in the critical testing and analyzing which guard every step.

This is the vital element of SWP House Paint and every other Sherwin-Williams product. No "cheap" process even comprehends such perfection. The most skillful cannot exactly duplicate it—even though the "balanced" formula is known to all. It is Sherwin-Williams.

Let "Paint Headquarters" save money for you

What is true of "cheap" paints is also true of "cheap" varnishes, lacquers or enamels. "Low-price-per-gallon" and economy are miles and miles apart.

If your house needs repainting see your local Sherwin-Williams dealer. Get comparative estimates on "cheap" paint and SWP House Paint. Base your choice upon the cost of the job—not the gallon price.

And do not forget that "labor" is not figured on the quality of paint used. It costs just as much to apply a "cheap" paint as SWP.

If you want the name of a painter in your vicinity who endorses SWP and will apply it for you, write us.

We will also send literature or information regarding any Sherwin-Williams quality paint product and a free copy of the famous "Household Painting Guide" which saves mistakes in painting. Write summoned him. He walked up to the safe, without hesitation turned the knob to the proper combination, and the big steel door swung open.

Back in the inner office Houdini, on a sudden impulse, said: "I'll show you the secret. No one has seen it before."

He took from his waistcoat pocket something that resembled the case of a watch, save that within was a single sensitive dial instead of the two fixed hands.

"I made this myself," he said. "It is the only one in the world. If you knew what it meant, and how to use it, it would give you the combination of any safe anywhere."

He slipped it back into his pocket.

The two men left the office together. It was in a large building stretching to two streets, with entrances on both, the rear entrance being closed after six-thirty at night. Absent-mindedly, after they left the elevator, the lawyer led the way toward the rear entrance; but as they reached it he saw that the heavy, burglar-proof locking apparatus had been set, and the doors were closed for the night.

"I'm sorry," he said, turning. "We'll have to use the other exit."

He took a few paces, continuing the conversation, when suddenly he noticed that Houdini was no longer by his side. He turned back just as Houdini was starting to call him.

Houdini stood holding the "burglar-proof" door open, grinning like an urchin.

"What's the matter with this exit?" he asked naïvely. "It opens all right."

They passed into the street and then Houdini stooped over the lock a minute.

"I'd better leave this the way I found it, or your office might be robbed in the night," he remarked. A few turns of his wrist and the lock was adjusted again.

By a curious irony of fate, after Houdini died no record could be found of the combination of his own private safe in his home, and no one could open it. On a certain day it became necessary, rather unexpectedly, to secure immediately certain papers locked in that enigmatic safe. It was election day, a holiday, and the office of the makers of the safe did not respond to the telephone, when an attempt was made to get them to send professional aid. Finally, through some roundabout inquiries, an expert retired cracksman was secured. He labored for half a day over a problem which Houdini could have solved, even in the case of a strange safe, on the instant. Finally, he had to blow the thing open.

MAGIC is almost as old, apparently, as man. In primitive times, the sleight-of-hand artist found a credulous audience, and easily preyed on the wonder and fear of his tribal mates for his own elevation. He pretended to control both good and evil spirits, and thus secured for himself the prerogatives and emoluments of a supernatural being. Up to fairly recent times the most reputable magicians did not disdain to permit the humble folk to believe that they had supernatural aid, or even that they occasionally received counsel from Beelzebub himself. The elaborate gimcrack apparatus, the peaked hat and the decorative flowing robes affected by the old-time magician lent color to this common belief, and the robes were also useful for making objects appear or vanish unexpectedly.

For hundreds of years, crowds gaped at performers who could swallow fire, glass, or swords, who could walk on red-hot coals, sit serenely in a burning cage, tread unharmed over broken glass, or mount a ladder of swords. These things sound like marvels, but they are very simple; quite in the elementary grades of magic. No supernatural aid is needed for such feats. In one of his books, "Miracle Mongers and their Methods," Houdini gave a comprehensive description of the various methods of accomplishing these seeming miracles. Some of them are not without risk, but they are normally safe enough for the seasoned performer.

During the past century the higher-grade magicians have steadily shown a tendency to disavow all claims to supernatural aid, and stand on their own feet as artists. The flowing robes and the superfluous hocus-pocus have been discarded. The profession has gained correspondingly in dignity and public favor. Houdini was surely the most explicit and painstaking of all magicians in explaining that his magic had no supernatural attachments.

MRS. HOUDINI writes: "When Houdini made a five-ton elephant vanish from the stage of the Hippodrome, that was a trick, and only a trick. I know how it was done and I saw every step of the arduous months of planning and preparation that made it possible. No demons or angels whisked the elephant away, and, I may add, there was no trap door, nor was a trap door possible with a huge tank of water just beneath the stage floor.

"When, on the same stage, Houdini would swallow, or seem to swallow, a large spoolful of thread and a dozen packages of needles, and would subsequently draw the thread out of his mouth with the needles strung on it at intervals, until two hundred threaded needles from his mouth were stretched on a hundred feet of thread across the stage—that also was a trick, and only a trick. I know how it was done, and I was with Houdini when he discovered the germ of it in an old book of magic picked up in a second-hand bookshop in London. No visitor from the other world imparted the knowledge.

"When Houdini escaped from every sort of manacling device, from every sort of prison cell, from every sort of cask and chest and packing case devised by experts and nailed up and sealed by them, these things were tricks, and tricks only. They were performed as the result of long forethought and skill, and persistent, arduous training, by a man of steel nerves; but there was no supernatural agency involved."

Despite Houdini's constant disavowals, a legend persists that he exercised peculiar psychic powers. The legend was assisted by statements of mediums, exposed by Houdini, who would assert, after he had duplicated their feats, that he also possessed psychic powers, which he was either unaware of or deliberately chose to conceal. That honest believer in alleged psychic manifestations, Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, who was Houdini's good friend, in spite of their disagreement about spirit-

Throughout the world, the productive Dunlop properties cover so vast an area that—if combined into one place—they would form a "Dunlop City" of over 100,000 acres

WITH all its vast area, Washington, D. C., occupies but 39,680 acres.

Preference for Dunlop Tires has caused Dunlop to grow so that now, including the greatest of all Dunlop plants at Buffalo, N.Y., Dunlop occupies a productive area of over 100,000 acres. Over 26,000,000 Dunlop tires are now running. The service that they give is both the cause and result of Dunlop's magnitude.

ETHYL GASOLINE

There is nothing mysterious about Ethyl Gasoline. It is selected motor gasoline containing "ETHYL" fluid, the compound developed by General Motors Research to take advantage of the higher compression created by carbon deposits or by advanced engine design.

So effective is "ETHYL" fluid—a patented compound containing tetraethyl lead—that it takes less than a teaspoonful to a gallon of gasoline to give your car a performance you have never known before.

You get more power on hills and heavy roads, quicker acceleration, reduced gear-shifting and a cooler engine—and as for high compression engines, Ethyl Gasoline made them possible!

More than 1,000,000 car owners are now riding with Ethyl. And its price is merely the price of good gasoline plus the few extra pennies that the "ETHYL" ingredient costs.

ualism, insisted that Houdini's skill was largely supernatural. To the end of his days Houdini was unable to shake Sir Arthur's conviction.

J. Hewat McKenzie, president of the British College of Psychic Science, in his book entitled "Spirit Intercourse," was equally emphatic:

> Houdini . . . is enabled by psychic power (though this he does not advertise) to open lock, handcuff, or bolt that is submitted to him [he wrote]. He has been imprisoned within heavily barred cells, doubly and trebly locked, and from them all he escaped with ease. This ability to unbolt locked doors is undoubtedly due to his mediumistic powers, and not to any normal mechanical operation on the lock. The force necessary to shoot a bolt within a lock is drawn from Houdini the medium, but it must not be thought that this is the only means by which he can escape from his prison, for at times his body has been dematerialized and withdrawn.

Houdini's reply to this was thoroughly explicit. He wrote:

"I do claim to free myself from the restraint of fetters and confinement, but positively state that I accomplish my purpose purely by physical, not psychical means. My methods are perfectly natural, resting on natural laws of physics. I do not dematerialize or materialize anything; I simply control and manipulate material things in a manner perfectly well understood by myself, and thoroughly accountable for, and equally understandable (if not duplicable) by any person to whom I may elect to divulge my secrets. But I hope to carry these secrets to the grave, as they are of no material benefit to mankind and if they should be used by dishonest persons they might become a serious menace."

A PECULIARLY pathetic instance of belief that Houdini could reach into the hidden world of psychic aid was afforded by Sarah Bernhardt.

Early in 1917, during her last tour of the United States, after she had lost her leg, Madame Bernhardt was playing in Boston at a time when Houdini was also filling an engagement there, at Keith's Theatre. She invited him to visit her at her hotel, and there for half an hour Houdini performed for her some of his choicest mysteries. The next day he was doing one of his outdoor stunts, and he invited the Divine Sarah to watch the performance from a car, as his guest. Thus she saw him thrust into a straitjacket, and chained and locked up, and suspended head downward from the top of a tall building, and from this precarious position she saw him get free.

As they were driving back in the car she suddenly embraced him, and in the caressing tones which only Bernhardt possessed, she said: "Houdini, you are a wonderful human being. You must possess some extraordinary power to perform such marvels. Won't you use it to bring back my limb for me?"

Houdini looked at her, at once thrilled and amazed.

"You can bring it back, can't you?" pleaded the golden voice. "You ought to be able to bring it back, since you do these feats that mystify mankind."

There were tears in Houdini's eyes as he gazed at her appealing face and told her that he could perform only feats that

By this Discovery—

Goodrich prevents wasteful tread wear on millions of cars!

WHAT you see under the plate glass, happens about 300 times every minute when you drive your car.

First, the tread yields as it meets the road, for balloon tires are soft.

So the Goodrich Silvertown tread is flexible — triple-grooved — hinge-centered—and it yields without distortion.

Second, the weight pressing down on the tire spreads toward the outer edges of the tread—the "shoulders."

So the Goodrich Silvertown tread has massive shoulders—continuous tracks of rubber—with the sharp-edged, all-direction grip of the safety blocks along the sides.

Such a tread is smooth-running. It doesn't "pile up." Because it is undistorted, it is free from the uneven, choppy wear which tire men call "cupping."

By this one discovery, the hinge-center tread, Goodrich puts thousands of extra miles in Silvertowns.

Now Comes the New Shorthand

For years there has been a crying need for a new system of shorthand—for a really modern, scientific system, that could be written more RAPIDLY than the conventional sign systems, that would be more ACCURATE—and that could be learned EASILY and QUICKLY.

Now at last it is here—the new shorthand. The business world has hailed it with enthusiasm. Already it is saving time and increasing efficiency in offices everywhere. Busy executives are using it themselves. So are professional men and women. Experienced stenographers as well as beginners are adopting it. It is used in the U. S. Army and the Navy.

Speedwriting
TRADE MARK REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.
The NATURAL SHORTHAND

You use only the ordinary letters of the alphabet—the same A B C's you have always used. Speedwriting is simply a scientific condensation of the English language, based on your natural habits of speech.

Quickly learned at home

No need to memorize a "foreign language" of dots and dashes, hooks and curves. You can start using Speedwriting almost at once. Amazing speed is quickly developed.

Speedwriting was originated by Miss Emma Dearborn, famous authority on shorthand. She has taught practically all systems for eighteen years in such institutions as Columbia University, Rochester Business Institute, Simmons College, and the University of California.

could be explained in a natural way. During the entire ride back she kept her eyes on his face, lost in deep thought.

There is a more or less prevalent belief that certain East Indian magicians are endowed with supernatural power which enables them to perform feats which no Occidental can emulate. As a matter of fact, the art of the magician as practiced in India is a century or more behind the art as developed in the Western nations. No East Indian conjurer has approached in skill and resourcefulness the late Alexander Herrmann or our own Harry Keller of happy memory. None can be compared with Houdini.

At best, the East Indian fakirs have a few clever stock tricks, which they have perfected through successive generations of performers, and in which the illusion is assisted for the Occidental spectator by the exotic setting and the elaborate Oriental hocus-pocus. Master magicians have come out of the Orient—no one who ever saw the great Ching Ling Foo would have the temerity to deny that—but they have been few and far between.

This was Houdini's view, not infrequently expressed, and it was the result of the most exhaustive study of magicians and their methods ever made by anyone.

THE principal stock trick of the fakir is the basket trick. In this, a boy is tied in a net and pushed into a pot-bellied basket, on which a lid is placed, and the whole concealed under a sheet. After many incantations, the magician removes the lid, stamps in the basket and finally, jumping out, jabs into it rapidly with a sword. After some further hocus-pocus, the boy is made to reappear from the basket.

As Houdini has explained, the boy is a contortionist. As soon as he enters the basket, he coils himself against the bulging sides. When the fakir is poking into the basket with his sword, the boy is wriggling about in the bottom, keeping out of reach, often guiding the thrusts between his legs, as every movement in the act has been painstakingly rehearsed over and again.

The pièce de luxe of the East Indian repertoire, however, is the rope trick. This is indeed difficult to explain by natural means.

According to the description, the fakir tosses a rope into the air. Magically the rope remains suspended upward, so to speak, into space. One of his assistants climbs the rope, and vanishes in the air. In a short time his dismembered body comes crashing to the ground. The fakir gathers the pieces together and places them under a cloth. Presently, the climber jumps up from the cloth—smiling, whole and unharmed.

There is only one trouble with this marvel—it was never performed. It is one of those things that a friend of a friend of mine had described to him by a man who had heard that it was done in a neighboring province.

Had Houdini placed his marvelous abilities to evil uses he would undoubtedly have been the gravest individual menace ever known to organized society. He could enter or leave any building or chamber at will, leaving no trace of breakage behind him, and he could open the strongest steel vault as easily as a skilled second-story man could pry loose a bedroom window. No cell or jail could hold him, for he could solve any lock system in a few minutes, and pass through the most elaborate door. Had he chosen the crooked path, society would have been compelled to have him put to death for its own protection, for nothing short of the capital penalty would have served.

Doubtless, Houdini would have created an even greater havoc in human society had he perverted his genius for illusion to make himself the central figure of a new religious cult. He could have done this without difficulty. Moreover, he was aware of what he could accomplish in making himself the inspired prophet of a new mystical religion, and the full implication, in wealth and power and position, of such a great adventure. Those of his friends who were privileged to witness the occasional "séances," usually of a wholly impromptu character, which he sometimes gave for their edification during his later years, can understand his possibilities in this field.

The gorgeous and terrifying effects he could produce, in the course of an evening at a friend's house where he happened to be making a social visit, made the ordinary mediumistic phenomena seem quite childish. The intelligent spectator would be awed, in spite of the repeated assurance from Houdini that he was merely being tricked.

Had Houdini posed as one supernaturally inspired, one who could escape even into another world and return with messages and mandates and commands, and had he chosen to vindicate his claim by achieving seeming miracles for which no one could find a normal physical explanation, he could easily have established a formidable army of worshipers, eager to be lifted out of a humdrum existence by messages from the skies. The pseudo-prophet would have been a more terrible portent than the super-cracksman, because of his power to sway the minds and souls of men.

FORTUNATELY neither crime nor Black Magic had any lure for Houdini. He was a healthy-minded human being, apparently with no abnormal rift in his psychological structure. It was natural for him to play straight, and so he lived and died as a great showman.

Yet that description falls short of doing Houdini justice. Quite aside from his professional genius, he was a rabbinical Puritan, with much sentimentalism in his rigid make-up, and a streak of mysticism. While he devoted his life largely to devising methods for the breaking of physical bonds, he was also interested in breaking psychic bonds and communicating with friends who had passed through a door for which he had no pick-lock. After the death of his mother, this curiosity developed into a passion. His experiences with mediums led him to a stern warfare against frauds who strove to palm off phenomena of trickery and sleight of hand as manifestations from the dead. During the last few years of his life all his energy and skill and showmanship was summoned to the service of his crusade.

"The woman who cleans wants Premier Duplex"

Says

*Mrs. Daniel Frey

41 Bennett Avenue

New York City

"I am a business woman and so have very little time for household tasks. Just the same, I am rather particular about my home. When I found a cleaning woman who would really clean I was delighted.

"I told her so and you will be interested to know what she replied: 'I've been cleaning houses for the last eleven years,' Sophie said, 'and I've used about every kind of cleaner. But I've never found one as good as this one.'

"I wondered just what she meant by 'good,' so I asked her a few questions. 'It cleans the rugs right through, without a lot of pushing back and forth. I never have to stop to oil it. That's one job I'm glad I'm rid of! When I'm finished cleaning a room with this Premier Duplex, it looks clean—and it is, too. It cleans so fast I can clean two rooms in the time it took me to clean one with any other cleaner.' Really here is praise worth while. Sophie ought to know a good cleaner, since cleaning is her business."

*If you would like an interesting booklet containing the experience of women in every type of home from coast to coast, just ask the nearest Premier Duplex dealer or write to us direct. Without the slightest obligation, we will mail your copy.

"YELLOW MASK"

THERE are few things more unbecoming than yellowish teeth.

Observe yours—white or yellowish?

The presence of "Yellow Mask" is not a confession of neglect. Only now has dental science successfully provided the means for its removal. Safely, pleasantly and positively.

Here is what has happened! Dental science has perfected a pleasant, tasty tooth paste of "Tri Calcium Phosphate." This is a white, satiny powder that foremost dentists use for cleaning and polishing teeth. How it whitens! How it makes the enamel gleam! No "Yellow Mask" can cling when it gets to work. And yet it cannot harm the most delicate enamel.

on a trip to the wood pile. "Say, mister! That snow came down so thick you had to tunnel to get through it."

But they didn't want his stories now. Not the crowd that fresh, lippy young Sammy bossed. They thought they knew it all, themselves.

He had vowed to stay away from Pilot Grove; but when the day of Luther's return came he hitched Dolly up. "Just dropping in to say hello," he told her.

Luther occupied the seat Sammy had had on the earlier visit. Talking to him was the young, inquisitive, good-natured fellow Lem had seen with Matt Kahler.

"Morning, Luther."

"Hi, Lem!"

Lem told himself he wished only to welcome his old friend back, but without any conscious change of purpose he found himself striking in another direction. "Say, Luther, I want to talk to you."

"Let's have it, Lem."

Lem glanced at the stranger. "Well, not now. I—"

"Oh!" smiled Luther. "Well, flop your old bag of bones onto a chair in the front of the store and wait a while."

Old bag of bones! Right in front of this stranger Luther was making fun of him! Lem's eyebrows came down in indignation.

"Have a seat," Luther repeated. "Y' ain't in a hurry, are you? Y' ain't tearing your shirt to get something off your chest, are you?"

"Oh, no," Lem managed. "Any time'll do." But he made straight for the door. Have a seat in a pig's eye! Joshing a man right in front of a stranger! Flop your old bag of bones on a chair! Y' ain't tearing your shirt? Joshing! In front of a stranger!

LEM turned Dolly homeward. "They can all go to Hell in a handbasket!" He tried to make the commitment vehement, but it had no more force than a falling ball of paper. The truth was that he could no longer be resentful or indignant. All he had left now of emotion was an aching desolation.

Back at the farm he bent under this as he prepared his noon meal. The bacon and eggs and the warmed-over potatoes had no flavor; and his coffee grew cold while he stared through the window, as at the future. He shoved the cup aside and went slowly out to Dolly.

"'F you kick me out, too," he said, "it'll be just what I expect." She nuzzled her soft nose against the bulge of his stomach, and he went on. "Everybody else thinks I'm an old rooster ain't worth bothering with." Dolly continued to scratch her nose against the satisfying texture of the overalls. There was encouragement in her nose. "They can all go to Hell in a hand basket!" Lem burst out.

This time the permission was a little stronger. And after a time he was able to repeat it with even greater force. "They can all go to Hell in a handbasket!" His shoulders took a brace. He bit off a piece of plugcut as big as a hickory nut. Pride was at last victor over humility. A stiff upper lip! That was the ticket. You bet your coat and pants! Nobody'd get a chance to say Lem Grow'd caved in.

An automobile turned into his barnyard. He listened, hesitated, then went out. When he saw Sam Brekke, the stiffness went quite out of his upper lip. It trembled between gloomy doubt and stubborn hope that Sammy was come at last to ask him into the show; although he managed to hide its trembling behind a pretended condescension. "Well, Sammy, m'boy! What can I do for you?"

"Why, the fact is," said Sammy, "that we want you in the show, Lem. Pa's resurrected an old stage-coach and we want you to drive it, pretending you're bringing the first mail from Minneapolis after the winter's break-up."

Lem chewed and spat and presented a calm face to the sky. "Just a minute, Sammy," he said, and hurried into the barn.

There, behind the door, he flung his arms up, and opened his mouth in dumb jubilation. "'J hear that, old hay burner?" he whispered. "'J hear that?" Dolly twitched her tail and seemed to wink. "They've come around. By Gol, they have! I knew they never'd get their show going without me." The plugcut was all but swallowed before he remembered it and coughed vigorously.

When he emerged into Sam Brekke's view he had a fresh chew and his manner was calm. "Thought I'd left a fork under Dolly," he explained. "Didn't want her to step on it." He rolled his tobacco until it fitted into a hollow of his jaw. "Le's see! You say you want me to do something in the pageant, Sammy?"

"Nothing hard," Sam said. "Just drive a stage-coach. You remember how the town used to be frozen in pretty near every winter? And how it used to celebrate when the roads opened up? Well, we'll have the field inside the fair grounds race track full of people, in front of stage scenery made to look like Pilot Grove about in the Seventies. It'll be at night, and things'll show up fine under the electric lights. And you'll drive in—with the first mails—from behind the grandstand. Get the idea?"

Get the idea! Lem spat. As if he didn't; better than anybody. Hadn't he been the one to bring that first mail, each February or March as it might be—Pilot Grove's first news in months? Get the idea! As if he didn't!

HE SHOWED scant interest, however. He wasn't going to let this fresh, lippy young squirt think he was doing anybody a favor. "Le's see," he said. "When is this pageant?"

"When—" Sam's eyes widened incredulously. "My lord! Even out here you ought to learn that much, Lem. It starts to-morrow night. That's the day after to-day. And we give the show three nights running—to-morrow, the next night, and the one after that." He shrugged impatiently. "If you don't want to drive, Lem, say so."

"To-morrow!" Lem said. "By Gol! I figured to haul some feed to-morrow. But I guess I can change my plans, Sammy. Sure! I'll help you boys out."

"All right!" Sam turned to his automobile. "There'll be a rehearsal to-night, at seven. You be there on time."

"Just a minute!" Lem shifted his plug-cut. "What horses've you got for me to drive, Sammy?"

"Oh, we'll have horses for you." Sammy kicked the starter. "We'll have horses enough to haul the coach around from behind the grand-stand. You ain't going to make an endurance run from Minneapolis. Don't worry."

He was off, his motor thundering a contrast to the creak of wheels and the snap of leather that Lem's memory associated with departures.

Worry? Who was worrying? Lem returned to the barn. There, leaning against Dolly, he rubbed the round pod of his stomach as though he had just had an extraordinarily satisfying meal. He smiled. Finally he took out a red handkerchief and blew a tremendous blast.

"Ha!" He slapped Dolly's rump until she teetered protestingly. "Couldn't get along without the old rooster, after all. What'd I tell you?"

HE HITCHED Dolly up and sent her at a brisk trot into town. The rest of that afternoon, it seemed to him, could not have been improved upon. "Going to drive the mail coach in the pageant. Yep!" He told that over and over. There were dozens to whom that news must be of interest, and he missed none of them.

That, however, was the least of his pleasure. What counted far more importantly was his certainty that the rôle he was to play would make him the most prominent man in Pilot Grove. "See that old fellow? Last of the stage-coach drivers. You ought to hear his stories." Even after the pageant was over they would be talking that way. For weeks, months. Sammy had acted as if driving the coach didn't amount to much; but that young squirt didn't know everything.

With evening he turned Dolly's head toward the fair grounds. The strut was marked in his gait as he left her behind the grand-stand and marched, in the twilight, onto the field. All about, performers and workers made a hurrying welter through which he made a way with difficulty.

He was amazed and delighted when he saw the scenery of which Sammy had spoken. It was merely a canvas façade in imitation of frontier Pilot Grove; but under electric lights it looked real. And there would be nothing make-believe about the effect he would make when he swung his four horses up in front of it with a whole pack of folks hollering their welcome. "The real ticket. By Gol, it is that!"

He was some time finding Sammy, and when he did Sammy was busy enough for two men, instructing supernumeraries. In the background Lem noticed the same inquisitive, good-natured young man he had found on previous occasions talking to Matt Kahler, and to Luther Brekke.

"Holy Smokes!" Sammy cried. "Where've you been, Lem? We're waiting to try out your stunt."

"I'm here," Lem said happily. "Where's my rig and nags?"

"Fetch in that stage-coach!" Sammy's loud shout was directed at an assistant ten feet away. "Wait right here, Lem. I'll be back in two jerks."

Lem wrenched off a piece of plugcut. The crowd eddied. He found himself beside the stranger. He had been talking all the afternoon and it was natural to continue now. It was more natural than ever, for the stranger proved to be an unusually ready listener. The talk poured out in a clack as steady as a stick upon the spokes of a spinning wheel.

"HERE you are, Lem!" Sammy reappeared. "Here's your outfit. Now, the idea we want to work out is this—"

"Hold up a bit," said the stranger pleasantly. "I want the rest of this story, Sam. What was that," he kept close to Lem, "about the bear?"

Lem grinned and made a rapid end: "By Gol! You should of heard the lady from Boston holler!"

He turned quickly to his coach. He gave one look, then his jaw loosened in amazement, and he frowned at Sammy. "Sammy!" he protested, "You don't expect me to drive that outfit, do you?"

"What's the matter with that outfit?" Sammy asked.

"Now, look here, Sammy!" Lem was doing his best to be reasonable. "You've got a whole lot to learn: In the first place you've got me only two horses. I never drove anything but four in all my livelong life: no driver that thought anything of himself ever did. In the second place, I never drove anything but good horses." Although he tried hard, he could not keep an angry contempt out of the glance he turned upon the two ragged, bony plow horses hitched to the coach. "Crow baits!" he burst out.

"Don't act as if you were the whole show, Lem!" Lem recalled that the director of the other pageant had been stubborn; but this young squirt was downright pig-headed. "You won't be on long enough for anybody to notice whether you're driving thoroughbreds or plugs. And you know harness horses can't be picked up in every pasture nowadays."

"I've got to have good horses!" Lem spoke resolutely, although, inside his breast, that ominous pulse was again warning, "Look out! Look out!"

"Aw, blooey!" Sammy lost his temper. "I've got something else to do besides hunting horses. It'll have to be that rig or nothing. Let's go!"

"Listen, Sammy! I can't drive nags like that. I'd be laughed out of the county. I've got a reputation to—"

"Reputation!" Sammy cut in scornfully. "What do you mean, reputation? An old has-been like you ought to be glad to get into the pageant, without arguing about reputations."

Someone laughed in the deepening twilight. The warning pulse beat loudly. But Lem paid no heed. A has-been! Calling a man a has-been right in front of a whole crowd!

"A has-been, am I?" he cried. "Well, I ain't enough of a has-been to sit back of a pair of plugs like that." In an anger which rose above even the heavy realization that he was throwing away his miraculously given opportunity, he swung a trembling, rebuking hand against Sam Brekke's head. "Call a man old enough to be your grandfather names, will you!"

"Get off this field!" Sammy shouted. "Clear off before I have you thrown off."

"Just you try throwing anybody off!" Lem wheeled in a slow challenge that invited everyone. "Just anybody try to throw anybody off. I'm a proud old rooster, and I don't stand for any lip from fresh young squirts!"

Deliberately, with his whip cocked under one arm, he walked into the crowd and through it. Someone called, "Mr. Grow!" He looked around. It was the inquisitive stranger who had called. Beside the stranger stood another man whose head was bent over a black box. As Lem faced the pair his eyes met a blinding flash.

"Thanks!" the stranger called. "Come on!" He jerked his companion. "We can just make the bus for Minneapolis."

Thanks for what? Lem wondered. He untied Dolly and climbed into the buggy. Home, he stumbled into bed. He was too miserable next morning to get up. Dolly had hay, and nothing else mattered; but after a time the rattle of the mail man's flivver aroused him; and in a mood like that of ancient Christians who wore hair shirts, he decided to see what the paper had to say about the pageant.

He dressed in between long pauses and went out. The stories had always been on an inside page, "News of The State." He turned to that; no story was there. At the thought that on the opening day Sammy had failed to get a story, he could not quite down a feeling of satisfaction.

HE WAS refolding the paper when Page One caught his eye. Precisely, it was the caption over a picture which attracted him.

"Proud Old Rooster."

Lem read the caption, then he glanced at the picture, and then he stared.

"I'll kiss a pig!" he stuttered, and pelted for the barn. "Hi, Dolly! Look a-here." Before that intelligent horse's eyes he displayed a two-column likeness of himself, gazing truculently into the darkness of the race track. And while she munched hay and winked he read the story. It was, in the beginning, the story of his quarrel with Sammy.

A proud old rooster's crow, triumphant even in disaster, last night muffled the hammers which drove the last nails into the scenery of Pilot Grove's three-quarter-century pageant.

When it had died away all Pilot Grove knew what the rest of the world is being told now—that Lem Grow, sole survivor of the state's once colorful fraternity of stage-coach drivers, never will disgrace the memory of the blooded horses he has handled by driving a pair of crow baits. Not even at the price of a rôle in the Pageant, which he desired above pearls—

"It certainly makes Sammy out the fresh, lippy young squirt that he is," Lem told Dolly. And then he forgot triumph over his adversary in an elation stirred by the rest of the story. Everything was told. Everything. The blizzards. The raid. The bear. "By Gol!" he cried, "Dolly, it must of been this Special Correspondent that I talked with last night. And it was my picture the son-of-a-gun ran away with!"

HE WAS still marveling, with Dolly, over this discovery when Luther Brekke shouted from outside. He went out. With Luther was Matt Kahler. Matt held a copy of the paper.

"Listen, Lem!" Luther began. "That young pinhead of mine got off on the wrong foot last night. You're going to drive that coach. Matt's going to give you the gelding, and he's found three more horses almost as slick."

Lem's hands were stroking at his white beard, making movement to conceal their trembling. Luther mistook the deliberate pose for unfriendliness.

"Come on, Lem!" he urged. "We've got to have you. Everybody in town's talking. All the visitors'll think they've been bamboozled if they don't get to see you." He motioned to the paper in Matt's hand.

A rich, sweet contentment filled Lem. He swallowed, as if he had had the actual taste of it on his palate. "Why, of course I'll come," he told Luther. "Sure! Don't you worry about your show, Luther. I'll come."

Everybody talking! You bet your coat and pants everybody was talking. And he knew what they were saying, too.

"Hop in, then," said Luther. "We'll take you back in a hurry."

"No!" Lem stood firm. "I'll drive Dolly." He would not heed their protests. Not until they had gone would he set out.

He let Dolly go as she pleased. His own whole interest was centered upon a murmur which became more and more distinct. "See that old fellow? Last of the stage-coach drivers. You ought to hear his yarns!"

up over his head. While I admire an animal that is constantly alert, and that is radically so in time of general peril, I also admire a creature that possesses a certain stubborn geniality.

Not long ago I heard a rather pompous, absurd, individual say that he had never encountered a situation that he could not dominate. The raccoon is not of this dominant strain; but he gets vast enjoyment out of life. This one, for example, snoozing calmly in my boat: though captured by his arch-enemies, he must have his nap out.

Ancient civilizations depend much upon little customs: the Englishman must have his tea in the afternoon. . . . The raccoon belongs to an ancienter civilization than man, in a sense; and his siesta to him is a sacred thing. Man is developing all the time (so we understand); but from time immemorial the raccoon has been using his full mental and physical capacity. I am not one of those who believe that ere the advent of the automobile and the rifle wild creatures had an easy time of it. Civilization is the foe not only of the raccoon but of the raccoon's old enemies

Smiles You Can't Forget

Are Those Revealing Film-Free Teeth

Dentists find that keeping teeth white this new way is curbing tooth and gum disorders.

LOVELY teeth, such as you see here, are not kept white and dazzling by ordinary brushing methods. They receive a new and special care dental science now advises.

This new way acts by removing film on teeth, and film, modern opinion agrees, is the source of "off-color" teeth and of the commoner tooth and gum disorders.

Run your tongue across your teeth and you can feel film. A slippery, viscous coating. It forms on teeth and clings. In it, by the millions, breed the germs of acidity and decay.

Film is the basis of tartar. And tartar with germs is an established cause of pyorrhea.

Thus film is not merely a destroyer of beauty but a menace to healthy teeth and gums.

And ordinary brushing fails to successfully remove it.

To do that scientifically use the special film-removing dentifrice dentists advise, called Pepsodent. Pepsodent is based on the most recent scientific findings of the day. It differs in action by curdling the film, then removing it.

Use it twice daily and results will be amazing. To prove that, you are asked to accept a free 10-day tube. Send coupon.

as well. Nature's balance has always been kept; and where man is not, other grim enemies are found.

I recall another raccoon that equalled this one in his savoir faire. I was walking one winter down a causeway in Blake's Marsh, a vast reedy waste, now a part of a great game refuge. In a gnarled red cedar I came upon a raccoon basking in the genial sunshine. As he was in a low fork of the tree, I reached for him, and lifted him down by the back of the neck.

Snuggling him against my hunting coat, I walked on unconcernedly. At first I heard one or two low snarls of sleepy complaint. Then all was still. After a while I heard what seemed to be further growls. But my captive was fast asleep, and was snoring confidingly, contentedly in my arms! Somehow, that sort of experience with a wild thing "gets me" more than all the hunting and trapping in the world. I may have become too sentimental over that raccoon, but he made me think of Beaumont's beautiful lines:

They have most power to hurt us whom we love;
We lay our sleeping lives within their arms.

THIS whole country, that was now submerged by the flooded Santee, used to be planted in rice; and where the ancient banks once were are now lines of trees and bushes, marking the limits of the fields with perfect accuracy. Some of the bushes were deluged, or lay level on the flood, like a mermaid's streaming hair. Wherever there was a tree top or a bush top showing, there was some wanderer lodged. We came to a sweet-gum tree over which smilax vines had rioted. The top of this was some seven feet above the tide. Crouched in it were three handsome king-rails, and five swamp rabbits!

These little brown bunnies, quite distinct from the jaunty cottontails, are famous swimmers, and they are good climbers as well. I have known one to go as high as twenty feet in a hollow tree. What interested me about these refugees was the fact that they had not only climbed out of the water but had not rested until they were high above it. Three of them were in the vines near the very top of the bush. It seemed to me that they had taken into account the possibility of a further rise in the water. Thus ensconced, a rabbit will sit for days, nibbling the twigs and vines within reach, with pathetic yet genuine patience, awaiting the subsiding of the waters.

I was interested in seeing how many of the refugees were real swimmers; and I dislodged a good many of them just to test their ability. There is honestly no such thing as a wild creature that cannot swim. The king-rails would step off into the tide, and go gliding away in a swift serpentine fashion; the bunnies would take a frantic, timid plunge; but, once in, they swam with remarkable speed and grace; we passed a drove of razorbacks heading for the mainland shore. They always swim as if they are racing, their snouts high, crowding each other—occasionally one overriding the back of another. They are powerful swimmers—and apparently tireless. Though I have known thousands to swim, I never knew one to drown, except by being caught in some kind of natural trap. I once found the body of one of these creatures fixed in the tight fork of a tree—wedged in such a way that it was clear, that, attempting to swim through the crotch at a time when the flood was flush with it, he had been caught. The subsequent rise of the waters had drowned him.

Cattle are good swimmers—and sheep also; goats, too, though they dislike water as much as cats, and are as canny about getting wet. I have also seen a wild turkey swim—not a wounded one, either. But Prince and I were now to come to a real master of the art.

A LITTLE inundated swamp was ahead of us; and as we entered this the trees made paddling difficult. I tried to pull the canoe along by catching the saplings and drawing on them. The waters here had a glassy glide, broken purlingly by the trunks of the trees—broken also by the swimming of fugitives. I had seen so many rabbits that I paid little attention to them; and when I saw what I took at a glance to be another bunny, I gave him no attention. But suddenly I heard Prince behind me say, "Otter!" The lithe swimmer was then within fifteen feet of the boat—a long, glistening creature, with head held high, with white whiskers gleaming. He's a swimmer de luxe.

For a moment I saw him thus, marking his sinuous grace, marking also his gorgeous rich fur; then he humped himself like a diver in a jack-knife dive, and was gone into the dim heart of the flood. His long furred tail made identification of him certain. We waited for him to rise; but he did not come up again. For under-water swimming, I don't think a fish has much on an otter; and of all wild creatures inhabiting the delta, this obscure, elusive, elegant aristocrat is to me one of the most appealing.

More than once I have found their "slides"—the long smooth slopes of mud on some remote bank, down which they glide gleefully. There is not a more playful animal. Once, near an old abandoned place on the delta called Tranquillity (fit name!), I saw a family of otters sliding. The slide was perhaps fifteen feet high, glisteningly smooth, and overhung by marsh. Not far from its foot were the mud-covered timbers of an old, abandoned wharf.

The otters would slither down the bank, strike the water with a joyous kind of splash, and then swim over to the timbers, which were almost flush with the tide. On these they would crawl and preen themselves luxuriously in the sun. I say "preen," that is the impression their toilet-making gave. An otter is very fond of licking his exquisite fur; and in the sunlight after such a burnishing it glows radiantly.

Few animals, barring the wild-cat, are so secretive in their habits; and otters may live for years close to human habitations without having their presence suspected. I love an otter. He is the most graceful and joyous of creatures; and I never see one in a lonely creek or on some solitary bank without feeling that suddenly the soul of the place has uttered itself in beauty, that the palpitant heart of the wastelands has suddenly divulged its most intimate secret.

Considering once more the flood, it is

Does the . . .

New Blade Fallacy

Bar you from good shaves?

If you think a NEW blade is ready for shaving when you unwrap it you are pretty effectively barred from getting good shaves. That idea is a fallacy which is responsible for so many men putting up with poor shaves when they might have marvelously smooth ones.

Highly tempered steel is like a high-strung race horse—it requires constant care to keep it in condition. If you want that new blade to perform as it should, give it a rub down on a good strop just before you use it.

This is interesting

Fine razors have edges of tiny invisible teeth. Temperature changes, jolts and handling get these teeth out of alignment. That's why a blade pulls. Stropping smoothes them into line and restores a keen cutting edge.

A few turns on Twinplex puts an edge on a NEW blade that is a marvel for smooth shaving. And it's so easy to strop with Twinplex. No fussing—no reversing blade. Just slip blade in and turn—strops both edges at once and reverses blade at every turn, just as a barber does. You can't fail. 30 seconds a day will keep one blade marvelously keen, for weeks of the smoothest shaves you've ever known. Shaving is also easier and quicker with Twinplex, for a keen blade is a quick safe shaver.

You can now buy a Twinplex at any dealer's for as little as $2.50. It pays for itself in a few months and saves more than its cost each year thereafter. Other attractive Twinplex models at $3.50 and $5.00.

Send for the DULL HOUSE and FREE NEW blade stropped

Clever little Dull House solves the problem of disposing of old blades safely. Send 10¢ for it and we will also send you FREE one brand NEW blade stropped on Twinplex, just to show you what real shaving is. Name your razor.

interesting to know to what degree the more hapless of the mariners may be borne far away, literally into other lands. Having taken a curious interest in this matter, I can say that I knew of a buck to be caught by a drifting tree and drowned, and that his body was found a week later on a sea beach some twelve miles distant. Sea islands which formerly had no snakes have gradually become infested by them, because of the freshet tides that carry them, like so much flotsam, out into the ocean and then back upon the beaches.

Some thirty-five miles from the mouth of the Santee there is a popular bathing beach; and not long ago the seashore beauties were horrified to see a grim bull alligator riding the breakers as serenely as any summer-time Adonis of a bathing resort. He, of course, had been floated out to sea by a fresh-water flood; and, as he is quite as much at home in salt water as in fresh, he had journeyed on a sea voyage down the coast for his health.

Of those creatures that seem to love a freshet, none is more loud in its praise than the tiny marsh-wren—a little brown wisp of a songster. This frolic youngster lives, I imagine, in terror most of the time in the shadowy country of the marsh. But when it is flooded, and delightful rafts of sedge are drifting about, he is as engaging and as independent as our village "Central." He is the Ariel, as the alligator is the Caliban, of the delta. He bobs up and down on the sedge, carols a true-love ballad, inspects with refreshing pertness the sedges for the tiny insects that are his fare, and cares not a whit how the waters rage. Of course he has his wings. A thing with wings can afford, I think, to take life somewhat more jauntily, more angelically than we can.

IN THE presence of an ancient menace like a flood, our brothers of the wild have a certain native felicity of resource, a certain deft precision of judgment. When one of these mighty waters moves down the river, immersing the swamps and the low-lying lands, the life in those regions is very far from being terrorized. Indeed, the only things that I ever saw utterly demoralized by such a crisis were domesticated stock. In the face of a freshet's stormful, proud advancing, most wild creatures are resolute, resourceful, calm; they swim; they climb; they wait with infinite patience; yet I believe at such a time wild ducks are likely to be somewhat demoralized.

They are dependent upon sunny sandbars, reed-hung glassy creeks, well-defined regions. They do not seem to know what to do in a vast sea of rushing waters. I have observed at such a time myriads of wildfowl hurrying in long distracted lines, they knew not whither. In most cases, after much vague and circuitous flight, they betake themselves to the quieter backwaters of the flooded swamp, where they gorge themselves upon the luxurious foods that such a place offers. But when a deluge first takes the delta I have seen countless thousands of mallards, black ducks, and widgeons thronging wildly and tumultuously, embarrassed by a satiety of their native element. . . . Yet in the presence of its deadly peril a raccoon will enjoy his sleep serenely.

It was Mithridates, I think, who used to take small doses of poison, so that when some traitor should serve him with a spoonful of arsenic, he would not notice the delicate attention. He who knows of the troubles that one has to expect in life will be neither surprised nor stunned by them. They will be like things that he has long since experienced and sustained.

After we had left the Ridge with its inhabitants, Prince and I paddled northward over the drowned country, passing scores of groups of just such fugitives as I have described. We came at last to the gray, gloomy, but alluring margins of the great swamp, steeped now in this stifling tide. Here, we knew, were wild-cats, foxes, and bears; for the last, Prince had no especial relish. One thing we saw before we had skirted the swamp a hundred yards. A tall alder bush had a crown of smilax, and this was swaying in the current some six feet above the water.

As we drew up, we discerned a creature curled up in the vines. Of course we thought it to be a raccoon. But it was a fox! Doubtless, in swimming out of the submerged swamp, he had come to this refuge, and had climbed up into the cradling vines. He saw us coming; but he did not move. I could tell by his peaked ears that he was watching us intently; and soon I discerned his brilliant feline eyes. But he had no intention of moving if we passed him by. He seemed to me a very good sport—to hold himself in check while his fellest enemies drew near. He had been in the vines some time, I knew, for his fur was dry and fluffy. There he lay luxuriously—secure in a certain felicitous and admirable guile.

The fox, I think, moves in a mental orbit outside that of most creatures and of most men. His mental attitude is distinctly Oriental. Some people make a ponderous passage through the world by butting the bull off the bridge; others insinuate themselves around and over and under difficulties—secret and serpentine and delicately crafty, capriciously certain. To the latter class belongs the fox. Our cradled friend we left on the lonely swamp-edge, swaying in a hammock above the tide.

ON OUR homeward paddle, we picked up several rabbits that seemed worn out with swimming, two tame pigs, and another raccoon. All of these, upon reaching the plantation landing, we set free. Each in his own way left us: the pigs grunting unconcernedly, the raccoons pacing thoughtfully down the edges of the freshet, the bunnies hopping off among the leaves, pausing to lick their wet fur and to wash their faces with their paws.

Our hunt was at an end. It had been the most interesting one I had ever enjoyed. And we hadn't killed a thing! Like the liberated wild things, Prince and I made our way from the river to our hearths and homes—I to the big house near the river—he to his cabin amid the wistful autumn fields, fast fading now in the twilight, dewy and still and fragrant.

As I walked up to the plantation house, thinking of what my strange cruise had meant to me, I came upon my gun, leaning against a tree. Somehow I was glad that it had been left. For if a man takes a gun into the wilds with him, he may leave his heart at home.

by a gasolene engine. Many wells are from three to four thousand feet deep, so the shells, unless expertly handled, have plenty of chance to encounter a "twenty-eight-pound jar" before they reach the bottom. A premature explosion would mean destruction of hundreds of feet of casing, and clogging of the well. So expert is Thornton's handling of these shells that he has never broken a string of casing.

The nitroglycerin shells look like lengths of galvanized stove pipe. They are from three to ten feet long, and hold from ten to thirty quarts of nitroglycerin. If the formation to be "shot" is very tough, ten or even fifteen shells may be put down.

A bomb containing a clock set to go off at the time decided upon is let down on top of the last shell. When the bomb explodes, the concussion sets off the nitroglycerin. There is a low rumble, the earth trembles and with a roar the oil shoots out over the top.

IF YOU could see down into the well at the time of the explosion, you would see the powerful nitroglycerin pushing back the walls of the well, shoving the sand in all directions and creating a pocket, into which oil flows from every direction, accompanied always, in more or less volume, by gas.

"Sometimes the gas beats you to it, and starts coming up before you are ready for it," Tex explained. "That's what happened that time the five shells were blown up at me. I was just letting the fifth one down when I felt the line slacken and heard the gasolene engine speed up, because the load was taken off.

"Some of the fellows started to run. They knew that if that shell ever hit the top of the derrick—good night! The gas was sending it up like it was a feather floating over a hot radiator, and the odor was almost enough to knock a man down.

"I couldn't run. There was only one thing I could do: When that shell stuck her nose above the casin', I grabbed her. She was all covered with mud an' oil, naturally, an' it was like tryin' to catch a slippery fish.

"I set her down as polite an' gentle as I could, and started to wipe the sweat off my face when along comes another one. I grabbed that one too. I just had time to lay her down, when the remaining three shot up, so close together that I was afraid they'd bump one another. By the time I laid the last one down, my helpers were all a hundred yards away, an' they'd done the distance in a little over ten seconds."

In that same period, Tex had caught and laid down a hundred and fifty quarts of nitroglycerin.

"It was a similar situation that caused the worst oil-well fire in my experience," Tex went on. "I had loaded up a well to 'shoot' it, and had gone into the engine-house, about sixty feet away, to get some rest before the bomb went off.

"I had been lyin' down about four

EVEN TWICE WASHED Faces don't seem clean at night

Pore-dirt can never be washed away

A HARD-SCRUBBED face may seem clean enough when seen across the aisle of a car or over the desk in an office. But a face simply has to be clean when shown close up under night lights . . . or somebody's going to be the loser.

When you wash your face, the surface gets clean. But look in a mirror—now—and see the pore-dirt that can't be washed away. It's under the surface of your face this very minute.

Pore-dirt dulls the cleanest complexion. It needn't! And we'll gladly send a FREE tube of Pompeian Massage Cream to prove it to you.

Goes in pink...ROLLS OUT DINGY GRAY!

The cream was a clean pink when it went into the skin. But notice its color—now! Those dried pellets of cream are a dingy gray . . . gray with pore-dirt . . . dirt that couldn't have been dislodged by a heavy course of scrub-downs!

1. Photomicrograph taken under lens of powerful microscope showing section of skin before using Pompeian Massage Cream.

2. Photomicrograph of skin after using Pompeian. Compare the skin tone. Note the dried pellets of cream, dark with pore-dirt that has been rolled free.

And that's the sensational demonstration that turns men by the hundreds to this remarkable cream.

minutes when I heard an awful explosion. A shell had been blown into the top of the derrick. The side of the engine house swayed inward from the concussion like somebody steppin' on a paper box. About a second after the explosion it began to rain iron and timbers, rope and pieces of riggin' all over the roof of the engine house.

"I heard the well take fire, a big 'whooo-op!' like somebody shakin' out an enormous blanket.

"When I stepped outside I saw a surprisin' sight. The derrick an' riggin' was gone. The ground was covered with oil, an' the oil was a-fire. In the flames, near the well, I saw seven small round objects. I knew what those were. It was the crew. I rushed in, after soakin' my clothes in water, and dragged the men out. Every one was dead.

"That was about the worst fire I ever saw, but it wasn't the narrowest escape I ever had. That happened when a spark caused by friction in the machinery set a well on fire, and in some way the fire had shot out sideways. It burrowed into the sides of the cellar, and came out in three different places, making three big 'torches' to handle instead of the usual one. Mostly, there's a space where there isn't any flame, all the way from ten to fifteen feet up from the well casin'. This is the space where the gas mixes with the air to form a combustible mixture. But, in this case, the air was gettin' to the gas awfully low down.

"I was standin' over the well with a thirty-quart nitroglycerin shell in my arms, wondering how I was goin' to place my shot so as to get all three flames at once, when the piece of bank I was standin' on collapsed. I couldn't drop the shell. I didn't dare to try to catch myself. I had less than a second to decide what to do. I figured the best thing was to slide down standin' as nearly upright as I could. If I fell, the shell would go off.

"I went down slow, like a statue, with the crumblin' dirt. At the bottom of the hole, I toppled over—still hangin' onto the shell, so the nitroglycerin wouldn't pour out of it into the fire. I lay there a minute wonderin' whether I was dead or not. I expected the heat to set the explosive off any second.

"But I was as calm as anything. I says to myself, 'Well, here I am in the hands of the Almighty. If He wants me to die, I'm goin' to pass out now. If He don't want me to die, I'd better start movin'.' I made sure of my footin', an' walked up out of there. Some of the gang thought I was a ghost. . . . I don't believe in quittin' just because the odds look bad.

"THE biggest thrill I ever had was in a well that I was just gettin' ready to 'shoot.' I was standin' over the casin' lookin' down—hadn't even taken my explosives out of the car—when the gas in that well let go.

"It had a pressure of about six hundred pounds to the square inch, three times what they carry in an ordinary locomotive boiler; and all of it went up my pants legs!

"My clothes seemed to puff up around my head an' blow up like a paper sack. The next thing I knew, I was sailin' toward the top of the derrick accompanied by a lot of ribbons. I turned over a couple o' times, an' come down, a-sittin'. It knocked the breath out of me.

"When I came to, I had to laugh with the rest of the boys. All I had on was my shoes an' socks, the cuffs of my sleeves an' the neck band of my shirt. Oh, yes—an' I still had my hat in my hand!

"I guess you wonder how, with the pressure so strong, an oil well can be shut off after it is 'shot,' or after a fire is put out. When you see a well puttin' out fifty to a hundred million cubic foot of gas a day, it looks like nothin' could ever stem such a flow. But, like most 'impossible' things, it's really very simple.

"Suppose you want to put a faucet on a pipe when the water is runnin'. All you have to do is open the faucet, an' screw it on. With the valve open, the pressure is hardly noticeable. That's exactly what they do with an oil well.

"When a well is ready to be shut off, they lower a gate valve down over the casin' with a pulley. The big valve, which is open, is screwed onto the casin', an' then they shut 'er off. When you shut off a roarin' well after listenin' to it for hours, the sudden silence is almost deafenin'!

"When a well fire is shot out at night, many of the spectators are surprised to find themselves in the dark. One time a big crowd turned out a little after midnight to watch me shoot a fire.

"The folks were on a little hill about a quarter of a mile away. I set the shell, an' fired 'er off. It was blindin' dark all of a sudden, and quite scary to anybody not used to it, because there was still the rushin' roar of the gas. But there was a louder noise that rose above everything else. Those people on the hill went into a panic! Some of 'em tried to get away, an' there was the awfullest mix-up of automobiles you ever saw. It was worse than a cattle stampede. But finally the calmer ones in the crowd got the rest of 'em quieted down, although not without some cussin' being done.

"You can't keep people away from an oil-well fire. Not long ago, up in Kansas, where I flew to a fire in my airplane, they closed up a little town near by, includin' the schools an' the post office, and everybody turned out to watch me. There is seldom less than a thousand people on hand when a fire is to be put out, and I have performed before as many as ten thousand.

"ONE of the funniest things I ever saw, although it was uncomfortable for the victims, happened at a well I was shootin'.

"We had herded the crowd back from the well, but a man and a woman in a brand-new, expensive automobile insisted on drivin' up closer an' closer, until, finally, they were almost in the shadow of the derrick. It was the zero hour, and the bomb down in the well was due to let go any second.

"I yelled at the woman. She was a pretty woman, all dressed up in a new white dress. The man with her was dressed up like a million dollars too. You could see they was people used to doin' about as they pleased. No, sir, she wouldn't get back—not more'n five foot, anyway.

"I felt the ground tremble, an' got out of the way.

"That well was a gusher. She shot out the gooeyest mess of oil an' mud you ever saw. It went 'way over the top of the derrick, at least a hundred foot in the air,

At All Druggists.

Take your favorite shaving soap and lather up one-half of your face. Lather it well. Brush it up. Rub it in. Hot towel it, and lather it again. Give the Old Soap all the breaks!

Now wet down the other side of your face—with hot water or cold—and leave it wet. Then spread on a film of creamy, cooling Barbasol. No brush. No lathering. No rub-in. Shave! Like this:

1—Wash the face (and leave it wet)
2—Spread on Barbasol (but don't rub in)
3—Shave

Do this for three days in a row, and compare sides while you're shaving.

Notice the difference between shaving the soap side and the Barbasol side. On the soap side there's pull and drag and smarting beard resistance. On the Barbasol side, all smoothness, ease and silky coolness!

Note how long it took you to fix up the soap side for the slaughter, and how short a time on the Barbasol side for the shaving! That means good time saved when you double it for both sides of your face.

Let your face decide

You'll feel the difference. One side all hot and dry, where the soapy alkali worked on the skin. The Barbasol side all smooth and soft and cool, because Barbasol leaves the natural oils right in the skin. No after-smart, no sting, no burn, no ingrowing hairs with Barbasol.

After one treatment

you feel new life in your hair!

It feels good, the new vigor of scalp circulation which follows the very first treatment with Pinaud's Eau de Quinine.

And it is good for your hair!

Pinaud's goes to the source of hair troubles. It destroys the germ which causes dandruff and leads to thin hair or baldness. It brings rich nourishment to the hair roots.

If you are uneasy about your hair, if it is coming out heavily, or is not as thick and strong as it might be, use the Pinaud treatment.

If your hair is in good condition, use Pinaud's to prevent loss of hair health and to give the comfort of immaculate head grooming.

You'll be amazed at the difference this treatment, used every day, makes in the vigor, the thickness of your hair:

EVERY MORNING wet your hair and scalp thoroughly with Pinaud's Eau de Quinine. Then with your fingers pressed down firmly, move the scalp vigorously in every direction, working the tonic into every inch of the scalp. Move the scalp, not the fingers! Brush the hair while still moist. It will lie smoothly just the way you want it.

A keen sense of hair health, the tingling feel of new life in the scalp, follow this treatment the first time you use it. Soon your hair is growing thickly and strongly!

Buy Pinaud's Eau de Quinine at your drug or department store today and be ready to begin the treatment tomorrow.

Always look for the signature of Ed. Pinaud in red on the bottle. Pinaud, Paris, New York.

made a big, brown, slick arch, an' come down on top of that open automobile, like a cloudburst! Pfooie! The car an' the man an' the woman was just one big brown gob, like a fresh-dipped chocolate drop."

"Getting back to oil well fires," I suggested, "how long does it take to put a fire out?"

"All the way from two hours to two days," Tex replied. "I often work from thirty-six to forty hours on a fire without stoppin' to rest. The longest stretch I ever put in was forty-one hours. That was a tough job. I burned up fifteen hundred dollars' worth of asbestos suits on that job."

"How many suits would that be?"

"Fourteen; they cost from a hundred to two hundred dollars apiece. I said 'burn;' they don't really burn, but they get torn, and they wear out awfully fast. Many people ask me if I can feel the fire through them. I sure can. Sometimes I have my men play a stream of water on me when I go into a blaze, and even then it gets right tropical inside one of those suits.

"ANOTHER question that's often asked is, How do oil-well fires generally start? They start from lightning, and static electricity usually. There is lots of static here on these dry plains. When it's still an' sultry, with low-hangin' clouds in the sky—look out! The live electricity in the clouds is liable to come down close enough to meet the static in the earth—and there she goes!

"Then again, a well will catch fire without leavin' any trace of the cause. The oil fields are dotted with these mystery fires, an' I think I've got the mystery solved for a lot of cases. You know, there are often a lot of pebbles mixed in with the oil sands, an' I believe that sometimes these pebbles get thrown out by the gas. They strike the iron in the riggin', makin' a spark; an' that's all it takes, just a tiny little spark. I know of one well that was seen to catch fire in the top of the derrick, a big sheet of flame; an' afterward we found a lot of pebbles on the ground.

"Another very common cause of fire is friction in the machinery. A cable will rub another cable, or a piece of casin' bein' let down will strike the casin' already in the well, an' make a spark.

"Sometimes spontaneous combustion in old rags or waste left lyin' around will turn the trick. The rags or waste will generate heat an' smolder unnoticed until some gas filters down an' touches it."

"What would happen if an oil well were allowed to burn?"

"If it was a small well, not puttin' out much oil or gas," Tex said, "it would burn itself out; but if it was a large one, the increased draft, caused by the gas rushin' out to meet the fire, would gradually wear down the sides of the well—down deep where there's no casin'—an' the well would fill up, plug itself shut. A plugged well must be drilled out again, an' that sometimes costs almost as much as it cost to drill the well in the first place.

"An oil well fire is an expensive proposition. That's why I occasionally get paid up into five figures for puttin' one out.

Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"The derrick an' equipment may cost all the way from $20,000 in a little well, to five times that much; an' the drillin' expense is likely to be more than $100,000 in any well.

"Then, there's the loss of the oil that's bein' burned, which may run as high as $5,000 a day, an' the loss of the gas.

"Take a well doin' fifty to sixty million cubic foot of gas a day, an' you're losing a lot of gas. That's enough, for instance, to make a daily supply for a city of a quarter of a million people. Natural gas, you know, is piped from the oil fields into the cities. There are pipe lines five and six hundred miles long carryin' the gas from the oil fields into the big Central West cities."

THERE is a saying in the Texas Panhandle oil fields that Tex Thornton uses nitroglycerin for almost every emergency he meets. "He'd use it to shingle his house with, if there were no other way to get the job done," one of his friends laughingly told me.

I learned of two unique uses Tex had made of his favorite high explosive:

Last fall the citizens of Amarillo wanted to raise some money quickly for their annual Tri-State and Auto Show. Tex was taken in on the problem. He decided to hold what he called a "Junkitqwik."

Twenty old automobiles were assembled at the top of a high cliff. One by one they were started up, and started over the cliff. As they reached the edge, each one passed over a small mound in which Tex had buried a quart of nitroglycerin. The old cars were sprinkled with gasolene.

When one passed over the mound, Tex would throw the plunger on his "hot shot." The nitroglycerin would explode, the car would sail into the air, and come down a-flame, to land, broken into thousands of pieces at the bottom of the cliff. Twenty thousand people turned out to watch the stunt, and ten thousand dollars was raised from the admissions for the fair and auto show.

On another occasion, Tex put his talents to a more important, if not more spectacular, use. A heavy rainstorm had left the Panhandle country spotted with "lakes" which had no outlets. One of these lakes covered a hundred acres, and crossed one of the main highways into Amarillo, shutting off all traffic from that direction.

"Let Tex go out and blow the lake up," someone laughingly suggested.

But Tex accepted the jest as a challenge. He contracted with the county officials to remove the lake within a week.

He went to the big pond, dug a hole ten feet across and ten feet deep, and at the bottom planted a hundred quarts of nitroglycerin. The hole was at the edge of the water. When the explosive went off, it cracked the earth clear down to the underlying porous sand stratum, thirty feet below, which was exactly what Tex wanted it to do.

With a mighty gurgle and swish, the waters of the lake drained down this artificial sink-hole, and rejoined the great underground reservoir that underlies that part of the country. Inside of a week the ground where the lake had once been was baked dry by the sun!

STETSON HATS

Styled for Young Men
$8 to $40

FIVE REASONS WHY you should buy a Stetson

STYLE: Recognizing the influence of young men in the trend of style, Stetson designs hats in accord with the ideas of young men in the world's style centers: New York, London, Paris.

QUALITY: Stetson quality is the standard by which all other hats are judged. It is the result of careful selection of materials and years of experience in the manufacture of hats.

MATERIALS: The finest selections of beaver, nutria, hare, and rabbit fur are cut from the skins in the Stetson factory. The trimmings are woven by Stetson from the finest raw silk.

WORKMANSHIP: All Stetsons are made carefully by hand. The men who make them and the women who trim them have been trained by Stetson to adhere strictly to the Stetson standard.

VALUE: Divide the price of a Stetson by the number of days you wear it and you will find how economical a Stetson really is.

How modern is your watch-chain?

PERHAPS it isn't modern at all! How long have you been wearing it? . . . A new chain costs very little. . . . Ask your jeweler to show you his complete assortment of Simmons Chains—Dickens, Vest and Belt Chains as well as Waldemars. And compare the chain you're wearing now with the smart, new Simmons designs!

Especially notice the Bondstreet. This handsome Simmons Waldemar has established a new style trend for watch-chains. Its sturdy links are twice as large as the usual ones; yet the Bondstreet, for all its extra size, is graceful.

Simmons Chains are made of the finest materials. Our special process of drawing natural, green or white gold over a stout metal core assures years of service. . . . The chain shown here is a Bondstreet — No. 29589. Price, $11.25. Other designs are priced proportionately low. R. F. Simmons Co., Attleboro, Mass.

attendance. (The devil is a very shrewd worker. Is there any church in the world where he did not plan the ventilation and construct the pews?)

As I grew older, I developed a smoldering resentment against our poverty and our piety. I loved my father in a vague boyish fashion, but I looked at his kindly face and stooped shoulders, and felt impatient. He was a college man. He knew more than the fathers of any of my playmates. But what did it profit him? Our house was worn and threadbare, lacking in all the comforts except books. Mother's clothes looked always as if somebody had sent them to her in a missionary box; and, indeed, many of them did come after that fashion, from a rich sister in New York. We were always neat, but patched and sewed up, and with trousers that never quite kept pace with our growth. And as for the pleasures of life—the circus and the theatre and trips on the railroad—these were entirely outside our world.

At the age of sixteen I had come to the conclusion that only one thing was worth having—plenty of good, hard money. Everything else would come afterward. And as for those who served the Lord, and traded away their success in this world on the chance of a golden reward in the next—they were fools indeed.

When I left home at eighteen it was to steer for the first bank that would give me a job. I wanted to be where there was money.

The next fifteen years of my life were merely a repetition of what happens in the careers of hundreds of thousands of American young men. It seemed a million miles from my humble job in the bank to the presidency. Men who supposed themselves to be wise in the ways of the world advised me that I was making a great mistake. "A bank is nothing but a graveyard," they said. "You will never get anywhere by sticking there." But banks grow, as every sound enterprise is bound to grow in this rapidly developing country. And men die in banks as elsewhere; and youth moves up.

But I am getting ahead of my story. At the age of twenty-nine I married the daughter of a prominent doctor. For ten years we were as happy as any young couple could possibly be. We had four fine children. We paid off the mortgage on a comfortable home in one of the best suburbs. We saved money. I was making steady progress in the bank. In short, we seemed to have everything that the heart could desire. At least, I was sure of it for those ten years. Then suddenly, as I came to my fortieth birthday, something happened.

I KNOW now what it was that happened. The same thing has happened a million times in the lives of other men. I was reading the other day the big red volume which G. Stanley Hall, the eminent psychologist, wrote on Senesence, which is the long word for old age. He has a chapter entitled "The Youth of Old Age," which is so revealing in its analysis of human nature that it ought to be read by every man and woman between the ages of thirty-five and fifty.

Doctor Hall says that there is a "dangerous age" for men and women which is far more destructive than the critical periods of youth. It comes at the threshold of middle age. Illusions have vanished. For the first time one begins to feel the limitations of physical powers. The job that was so exciting when one entered the business world has become a settled routine. One realizes that, while there will be reasonable progress in position and earning power, there will probably never be any great stroke of fortune. The girl whom one desired with so fierce a hunger is a comfortable wife and mother of fifteen years' experience, beginning to gain a little in weight and to take on streaks of gray about the temples. Money is more plentiful.

This is the stream of thought that flows through many minds on the verge of middle age, says Doctor Hall. Each man deceives himself with the notion that his own case is unique. He assumes that nobody has ever experienced quite the same sense of the futility of routine. He thinks: "I have worked hard. I have provided for my family. My youth is almost gone. I am entitled to a little fun."

Perhaps a man seldom sets down his thinking in quite such logical fashion. I am sure that I did not. But the feeling is there; and it is fertile ground for the seeds that ripen into broken hearts and wrecked homes.

As president of the bank, it was necessary for me to make frequent trips to Chicago. One of the big banks there was our correspondent, and we had important interests. Things were going very well; I should have been very happy; and yet the restlessness was in me. The thought of being hurled into old age too quickly began to gnaw at my heart. Surely, there must be something else in life than I had found. Pleasures that I had not tasted. I had worked hard. I deserved a good time.

THIS was my mood one evening in Chicago, when I sat alone in the hotel lobby wondering how I should spend the hours until bedtime. I was lonesome and restless. And that evening I met Jeanette.

Our friendship began in a very proper and harmless fashion. I took her to the theatre and afterward saw her home to the little apartment where she lived, just north of the river. She was part owner in a beauty shop and made a very good income for a girl. There was no commercial taint in her friendship for me. She needed nothing. And because she needed nothing, and never asked, I had pleasure, as time went on, in giving her various presents. She was well educated, had traveled a little and kept up her reading, so that she was an interesting companion. Also, she was thirty-five years old, and admitted that she had no hope of matrimony. So I said to myself, when my conscience pricked: "I am not harming her. I am not keeping her from the society of a man who might give her marriage and a home. She is alone in the world and glad of my friendship."

Human nature is such that the relations between two people can never remain static. Jeanette and I began on a purely Platonic basis, but in spite of our precautions we found ourselves drifting into feelings much stronger than friendship. I began to look forward restlessly to my trips to Chicago, and to prolong them unnecessarily.

Looking back I find it hard to select words that will describe the emotions of those two years. Those who have passed through similar experiences will understand without any long description. Those who have never known the strain and tension of divided affections will, I hope, find this frank personal testimony a signal of warning. It is for them that I write it. When I was with Jeanette I forgot everything else. I said to myself: "I am wonderfully happy. This companionship is given to me as a reward of my hard, honest work. It is harming nobody. There is no reason why I should not enjoy it." But immediately I got on the train and turned my face toward home, the doubts and prickings of conscience began.

SOMETIMES at home there were moments that sent a cold chill of apprehension down my spine. A good woman has an instinct that is far deeper than logic. She knows, without being told, when things are not right. Thus, my wife said one day, out of a clear sky:

"It seems to me you have to go to Chicago much more than you used to. Is it only business?"

I answered in quick irritation:

"Of course it is business. What else would it be?"

"Nothing," she answered. And then, in a quiet tone, "I sometimes hate business. It keeps you away so much. The children need you and I am lonesome. Why do you have to work so hard? We have enough. Why not play with me a little as we used to?"

"You don't understand," I said crisply, and left the room.

Another time she threw down the newspaper with an exclamation of disgust. "The Stonehams are getting a divorce," she said. "Mrs. Stoneham found him in New York with another woman. I thought they were perfectly happy. She is beautiful and adores him, and they have four wonderful children. How can a man be such a fool?"

I did not say anything. I was thinking of my last dinner with Jeanette in a secluded little restaurant in Chicago. A man from my own town, a hardware merchant, had come in with a garishly dressed, rouged and painted woman, and taken the table directly across from us. He nodded to me in a knowing fashion, as much as to say, "So you're doing it too, are you? Well, we old fellows have got to stick together." It made me hot to the very roots that he should put us in the same class; that he should have the effrontery to assume that his relations with this coarse creature and mine with Jeanette were of the same pattern. I was sore and scared. The fool! What brainless crack would he make when he got back home? How soon would the rumors begin to spread that something else than business was keeping me in Chicago?

The climax came in a strange way. I was walking one Sunday afternoon with my wife and little girl, aged ten. It was a beautiful day and our spirits were high.

I was talking with the little girl about the future.

"What sort of man do you want to marry?" I asked her. "A doctor, or a lawyer, or a policeman, or what?"

She lifted her blue eyes up to mine and spoke a single sentence, which was so unexpected that it cut to the very depths of my heart.

"I want to marry a man like you," she said.

A man like me! Suddenly the mask was stripped away, and I saw myself as I really was. What sort of man was I? A liar. A cheat. False to the wife who had struggled along with me for a start in life. False to the mother who had gone down into the valley of the shadow to bring me back our children. False to my little girl's ideal of manhood. False to my business associates, who were paying me for all my time and brains, and getting only a part of what I had to give. False even to Jeanette, who believed that I loved her, when my heart—in spite of all my folly—was still bound up in my home and children.

I need not burden this story with the details of my subsequent conversations with Jeanette. Has ever an illicit friendship failed to terminate except in tears? We thought we had been different from other people; we discovered how sordidly the same we were. There were reproaches and pleadings. There was bitterness and a heavy sense of self-disgust. I found that I liked Jeanette immensely, more than I had ever liked any woman except my wife. But her feeling for me was more than liking.

I had my home and my children. She had given her time and thought more and more to me, until I had unconsciously filled her life. I liked her. She loved me. I had done her the deepest injustice that a man can do a woman—I had let her care for me more than I could possibly care for her. Those are hard words to write, but they are true. They measure the depth of my bitter disgrace.

This is the story I told to the young man who came to see me in the bank that afternoon. The young man who had been trifling with the most sacred possessions that any man can have—his own reputation, and the affection and faith of his wife and children. He went away very thoughtful. Some weeks later he came in again. He simply gripped my hand and stood silent for a moment, and then went out. I knew that, because I was not a preacher but only a plain man, I had been able to do him good. And the feeling grew in me—and deepened until I could not escape from it—that, having helped him, I had to try to help other men.

There are some very simple thoughts which I would like to add by way of conclusion. I set them down in numbered form, like a balance sheet.

ONE: One of the truest sayings in the world is that "you can't have your cake and eat it too." Life is a series of choices. You can order this or that; but you cannot order both this and that, without paying an extra price. Some men consider the extra pleasure to be worth while at the price which is charged. I can only say for myself that, having tried it for two years, I know that in a single hour of remorse and self-condemnation I

Hair Health—the Facts

The American Magazine deals, in the main, with facts. Its readers, we assume, are people accustomed to dealing with facts, and able quickly to spot a fact or reject an exaggeration.

Take the health of your hair, for example. Goodness knows, there are plenty of modern Baron Munchausens talking about the hair! We all hear stories about curing dandruff — over the week-end. Stories of putting brand new hair on perfectly bald heads!

But there are a few simple facts. Here are some:

Doctors have studied the hair and scalp for years. They have watched the effects of various remedies on the health of the hair. And they have learned, for one thing, that pure pine tar, from the health-giving pine forests, is one of Nature's most effective remedies. As far as we know, there isn't a single medical work on the care of the hair that doesn't endorse pine tar.

However, doctors early learned that pine tar alone could not be conveniently applied to the scalp. So over 60 years ago Daniel Packer began to incorporate pine tar in soap—Packer's Tar Soap. And ever since physicians have been recommending Packer's because of the healthful pine tar in it.

Now, we never have offered Packer's as a cureall — and we never will, either. But we do promise you this: You can give your hair and scalp no more intelligent care than to wash it once a week with Packer's Tar Soap—and massage the lather in.

If you are like most of the men we know you will really enjoy your Packer shampoos. There's something about the out-door fragrance of those great piles of snowy Packer lather that makes a man like it. And there's something about a Packer massage that makes his scalp like it—and tingle and glow with health.

And so, if these homely facts strike you as sensible we suggest that you get a cake of Packer's this very day and begin tonight to give your hair and scalp the fine benefits of Packer shampoos. For your convenience, especially when traveling, each cake of Packer's is now packed in its own metal soap box. And, by the way, if you have never taken Packer's into the tub you simply don't know what a real man's bath is!

LASTING RESPECT

TRUE respect never can be manifested by a mere gesture. The salute to the flag must be founded upon patriotic citizenship.

Likewise, the farewell to a loved one should be followed by a conscientious fulfillment of the obligations due to those precious remains.

Thousands of families are solving this problem by using the Clark Grave Vault. They know it affords positive and permanent protection. They consider it as essential as a casket.

They know that this vault, being designed according to an immutable law of Nature, can not possibly allow any moisture to enter.

Further, because the Clark Vault is made entirely of special quality 12 gauge Keystone copper steel, or Armco Ingot Iron, it is highly rust-resisting. In the finer models a plating of pure cadmium is added, giving the greatest rust-resistance known to science. This cadmium plating is done by the famous Udylite process, exclusive on this vault.

Leading funeral directors recommend the Clark Grave Vault and give with each one a 50-year guaranty.

Less than Clark complete protection is no protection at all!

have suffered enough to offset all the hundreds of hours of stolen pleasure.

TWO: No man cheats anybody but himself. When, by his mode of life, he lies to his wife and business associates and his children, he may not be hurting them if—as sometimes happens—he dies without their ever finding out. But every moment of his truancy leaves its indelible imprint on his own heart and soul. The most fearsome thought in the world to me is the realization that a man can never escape from himself.

The Day of Judgment, as it will take place for souls in the hereafter, will be a comparatively simple affair. The old idea which we used to have, of the Almighty sitting in a judicial pose on the great white throne while the Recording Angel presents the records of our lives, is crude and I am sure, untrue. For each one of us will bear on his own soul the record of his judgment. What we are will determine what is to happen to us. Those who have made themselves worthy of fine companionship will be promoted to that fine companionship. Those who have debased themselves will be debased. Whether they will have another chance to start at the bottom and work up, we can only conjecture.

THREE: There is a verse which says that "the wages of sin is death." When we hear preachers read this verse it often makes very little impression on us, for we say to ourselves: "We know many very sinful people, and they are not struck dead. On the contrary, they often flourish and prosper beyond the measure of the righteous." We misunderstand the verse. Men's minds either grow in health or sink into disease and death according to their daily thinking. Fill a mind with clean, high thoughts, and it expands and increases in power and wholesome achievement. Let lust and envy and fear and lying come into it, and the fine thoughts are slowly but surely done to death. We have all seen young men start out in the full flush of enthusiasm, and gradually grow selfish and sordid. This is the greatest tragedy in all the world—the death of men while their bodies are still alive.

FOUR: More should be spoken and written about the pleasures of virtue.

I remember one summer morning when my youngsters came to pull me out of bed for a swim before breakfast. The sun, which promised a warm day, had not yet risen high enough to banish the lingering coolness of the night. We dove and swam and gamboled in the soft refreshing water, and I thought to myself, "It is impossible for a human spirit to contain within itself a larger sense of pleasure than I feel at this moment." . . . I remember the night when we drew our accumulated savings out of the bank and made the last payment on our first little home . . . I remember the day when we went together to buy our first cheap little automobile.

Can anyone claim that there is any pleasure in wrong-doing which lifts the spirit of man to a higher level than do these commonplace satisfactions of a happy normal life?

FIVE: The basic virtue on which all the other virtues stand is honesty. This cannot be too strongly emphasized, and in current preaching it is not emphasized nearly enough. There is much preaching against a glass of wine, and against card playing, and Sunday baseball, and the lure of women. These may or may not be sins. But when they are, dishonesty is the root of them. If a man is honest, he cannot be an unfaithful husband. If he is honest, he cannot be a shirking partner. If he is honest, he cannot be a snob nor a cheat nor a hypocrite. Train up boys to be honest, and the rest of the virtues will take care of themselves.

SIX: If I were setting down a list of ten of the greatest pleasures of life, I should include one old-fashioned pleasure which has rather fallen into neglect in these modern days. I refer to the very great joy that comes from thinking of other people. I speak from my own experience. When I had achieved a reasonable business success and financial independence—following my episode with Jeanette—I began to find work very irksome. What was there left to work for? Why should I carry on?

Gradually, a new idea came to me. I would do some nice things for my relations, and for some young people in our town whose parents had not been as lucky as I. The idea opened up a whole new world of interest. I began to work with more concentration than ever before—not to make more money for myself but to provide funds for these kindnesses that I had undertaken in behalf of others.

SEVEN: What we know as "morality" is not an arbitrary code established by preachers and ethical teachers. It is not even a product of the Christian religion. It goes back farther than any religion. It is the accumulated wisdom of all human experience.

Anything which costs more than it is worth is immoral. Everybody likes to flatter himself that he is smart rather than a fool. I have lived a long time and watched the human race. I have tried nearly everything on the program of existence. And I am comfortably established in a parlor car seat on the S. and N. And I am content.

"OH, YES! We always send to New York for our clothes!" And right there you discover where the professional shopper comes in. Next month, in the "Adventures of a Bargain Hunter," Mrs. Leila Leeds, who has been shopping for out-of-town folks for over thirty years, gives you some mighty interesting and informative facts that you, yourself, can use on your shopping trips. Orders from a spool of thread to the furnishings for a New Zealand ranch-house are all alike to her. She has outfitted thousands of brides and thousands of babies; once she brought up a whole family through the mails, and once she supplied a wife to a Westerner. This is an article of intense interest to women; but bachelors and married men also figure largely on Mrs. Leeds's list of clients.

This is Parker Pressureless Touch

Capillary attraction combined with gravity feed makes the ink flow at the slightest contact with paper—Barrel now Non-Breakable

This pen's feather-light weight alone is sufficient to start it writing instantly and keep it writing. Scarcely any pressure from your fingers—no effort, no fatigue. You simply guide this pen.

Doubly remarkable, because the new Duofold is 28% lighter in weight than when made with rubber. Now we are using Parker Permanite, a new material which, while making the pen lighter, has made it Non-Breakable also. We have thrown these new Duofolds from an aeroplane 3,000 feet aloft, and not one has broken!

But Pressureless Touch is most important, clearing the track for THINKING as no other feature in a fountain pen has ever done before.

Five smart colors—Lacquer-red, Lapis Lazuli Blue, Green Jade, Imperial Mandarin Yellow [new] and flashing Black and Gold.

Three sizes of pen barrels—the Over-size, the Junior and slender Lady Duofold, each offering six styles of pen points.

Get all these Parker features by being sure to look for "Geo. S. Parker —DUOFOLD" imprinted on each pen or pencil. Don't let color only be your guide.

"Isn't That a Funny Business for a Woman To Be In!"

once in a night school, with the one idea of learning how to take a trial balance. But somehow my teachers took little pains to find out what I wanted to know, or why I wanted it. Instead, they gave me a lot of stuff that was no use to me. I learned more by studying old trial balances in our own books at the office, and figuring out for myself how to make them."

Astrid had no trouble keeping the books. She even became an expert at trial balances. And before long she was reaching out for other tasks.

"When I was a little girl in Copenhagen," Mrs. Sawyer went on, "one of my greatest joys was to accompany a maid to the store when things were to be bought. Even on cold winter mornings, when the maid had to start before it was light, I would get up and go with her.

"I'm quite sure this delight in trading must have been born in me. And, to-day, I still would rather sell, or buy, than eat. This 'inborn' taste, which had lain dormant for a number of years, now began to reassert itself. By keeping the books I became familiar with materials and prices, and I soon found myself answering customers on the 'phone and talking with them in the office.

"I remember one day when there was nobody in but a clerk and myself. A caller entered, and introduced himself as the mayor of St. Charles, Illinois, saying he wanted to order two carloads of sewer pipe. That was an unusual piece of business in those days, and I was in no mind to let it slip away from us; yet I had no precedent for making a price. I knew that we sold similar pipe in small quantities in Chicago at twelve and three-tenths cents a foot. I did some quick thinking. Freight charges would have to be paid; yet I reckoned that a man buying two carloads all at once was entitled to some advantage in price. So, taking my courage in my hands, I quoted eleven and seven-tenths cents a foot. The mayor said that was all right. I booked the order, and my employer was delighted."

THAT act took courage. Many a man, in such a situation, would have said: "You'll have to wait and see the boss." And the order would have been lost.

"Give me more responsibility," cried this eager young woman, now in her early twenties. So they gave her more; in fact, she was soon the sales manager of that office.

It follows that, nine years after she pecked out periods for commas and mistook question marks for capital letters, Astrid Rosing had become a very different-appearing young woman. Attractive, with a confident yet reserved manner, she had proved herself a skillful business woman, able to organize, to direct men tactfully, and to get orders; and, at the same time, competent to master all the details of a technical business as well as any man, and better than some. She was then earning an excellent salary, had money in the bank, lived well, and took pleasure in keeping a prize-winning saddle horse. But not yet had Astrid Rosing drawn fully on the resources of courage and energy of which she was possessed. An emergency now called these into the open.

One of her brothers, with a friend, took a contract to do the grading work on a section of a new line of railroad being constructed in southern Illinois. As these two soon discovered, they lacked both the funds and experience to complete the venture successfully, and Astrid loaned them some of the money she had saved. Finally, seeing that things were going from bad to worse, and hoping to protect the money she had advanced, as well as to save the enterprise from complete disaster, she resigned her position in Chicago, and went down to live in a smoke-blackened tent in a railroad construction camp, among the roughest of laboring men.

ASTRID'S brother withdrew to go into another enterprise, and she was left alone to run the job. She knew absolutely nothing about railroad grading—but she did know something about supervising men. Accordingly, she set to work as if this were the most natural undertaking in the world for a young woman.

"I don't talk about what happened on that job," Mrs. Sawyer said, "because nobody would believe me if I told the truth! Who, for instance, would credit me with riding alone and unarmed eighteen miles to town every week over lonely stretches of road, to bring back the pay roll to the construction camp? Who would credit my living and sleeping and eating alone in a tent, in a camp made up of a hundred hobo laborers, without even the protection of a revolver? Or the fact that those men actually treated me as if I were a queen? Why I could make a book out of my experiences in that camp!"

And the amazing part of the whole grading episode is that Astrid Rosing did carry the job through. She finished it with high honor, if wholly without profit; for when the last creditor and the last laborer had been paid, and her fare back to Chicago paid, her savings were as the snows of yesteryear.

And it was at this precise juncture that Astrid Rosing, flat-broke and jobless, decided that the time had arrived for her to go into business for herself.

Now, a decision of that kind demanded courage of a high order. But that was just the type of courage the girl had been developing in her business career. And as a natural corollary of that career, she determined to establish herself in the building supplies line. She knew many of her former employer's customers, but she did not rely on that to get business. She struck out with the firm intention of standing squarely on her own two feet.

"In fact," said Mrs. Sawyer, "I believe there was only one of his regular customers who became one of mine at the start."

No wonder Postum holds a place of honor on two million dinner tables

Its only after effect is a desire for more

OWN up, now, you who have never tried Postum. You have always thought of it as a "health" drink, haven't you? As a kind of medicine.

Thousands were just as skeptical as you—until they tried Postum. Then they became Postum users for life!

Now you try it! You'll find it a health drink, to be sure. A drink that never robs you of a minute's sleep, that never flusters the nerves, that never brings on headaches or interferes with digestion, as caffein does. But—

You'll enjoy Postum itself as much as you enjoy its beneficial results!

It looks so tempting in the cup—a velvety brown changing to gold as cream is added. It smells so appetizing. And then its flavor—a flavor different from that of any other drink! Smooth and mellow, hearty, zestful!

A drink made from wholesome grain

Whole wheat and bran—these two, blended and roasted, give Postum its goodness. Not a trace of caffein or any other artificial stimulant in it.

Many hostesses, too, have discovered in Postum the best of all drinks for the late-evening supper—a drink that never causes sleepless after hours.

© 1928, P. Co., Inc.

Postum is one of the Post Health Products, which include also Grape-Nuts, Post Toasties, Post's Bran Flakes and Post's Bran Chocolate. Your grocer sells Postum in two forms. Instant Postum, made in the cup by adding boiling water, is one of the easiest drinks in the world to prepare. Postum Cereal is also easy to make, but should be boiled 20 minutes.

The best way to test Postum is to make it your mealtime drink for thirty days. Then you can judge both its flavor and its wonderful value to health. Before the thirty days are up, you'll not only know why millions prefer this drink—you'll join them in preferring it! Let Carrie Blanchard, food demonstrator, help you start this test.

Carrie Blanchard's offer

"Let me send you, free, one week's supply of Postum, together with my personal directions for preparing it, as a start on the 30-day test. Or if you would rather begin the test today, get Postum at your grocer's. It costs much less than most other mealtime drinks—only one-half cent a cup.

"Please indicate on the coupon whether you prefer Instant Postum, made instantly in the cup, or Postum Cereal, the kind you boil."

In Canada, address CANADIAN POSTUM CO., LTD. 812 Metropolitan Bldg., Toronto 2, Ontario.

Her method of doing business was to arrange with manufacturers and producers, particularly of sewer pipe and sand and gravel, to take a part of their output, which she then undertook to sell at a profit to dealers and contractors. From taking a few carloads a year from certain producers, the business has grown to the point where to-day she controls all the distribution in several states for many of her manufacturers; and she helped to design a building tile which is widely sold under her name.

"From the start I was eager," she told me, "to let the people I dealt with know I was in business to stay. I could have hired merely desk room; but there's an air of impermanence about desk room, so I leased a regular office in a Loop building. To do it, I had to borrow a hundred dollars.

"That was my starting capital. A debt for a hundred dollars!

"By the time I had paid the first month's rent, a few other bills, and purchased a typewriter, I was penniless. I concealed this, as if it were a sort of crime, feeling that if people knew they'd think I wasn't in my senses. By keeping my own books at first, I had no difficulty hiding the real state of my finances, and later, when I could afford help, I still concealed my financial condition from my bookkeeper, so that nobody could guess exactly my initial capital! A woman in business for herself was enough of a curiosity at that time (especially my kind of business) without exposing my finances as additional evidence that I might not be in my right mind!

"Situated as I was, I had to get business, and get it quick, and when I got it, I had to collect. There were no two ways about that. I do not remember the details of my very earliest sales, but somehow I managed to get orders enough to keep my head above water, and by efforts which sometimes were exceedingly strenuous, collected enough to discount my own bills.

"As soon as I could, I hired a girl to stay in the office. The business was strange to her, so about all she could do was to take the names of people who called, and I called them back when I returned from seeing prospects. I tried to be in my office at least a part of every day, and more than once, in order to carry through my schedule, I got up at four o'clock in the morning and caught a milk train, because I couldn't take any other train and make my rounds.

"PROMPT collections meant life or death to me, and sometimes my customers were not inclined to be prompt. I remember one man, located in a small city some little distance from Chicago, who simply wouldn't pay his bill. Finally, I got on the train and went to see him. He was not in his office or yard, but a neighbor told me I might find him at a certain saloon.

"Now, an old-fashioned saloon was no place for a woman. But I didn't stop to remember that. I went straight to the saloon, pushed back the swinging doors, saw my man, and called him out. I think it was because he was so utterly dumfounded at seeing me there that he walked back to his office and wrote me his check on the spot!

"When business came a little faster, I hired a salesman. I seldom had any difficulty myself in convincing a buyer that I knew my business and could and would deliver anything I undertook to sell; but it was so strange for a woman to be in this kind of business that it was sometimes a little hard for a third person to put over the idea that this particular woman knew what she was up to. I remember a contract on which I had bid, leaving it to my salesman to follow up with a personal call.

"'I'm sorry,' the buyer told the salesman, 'but I can't give you the order.'

"'Was something wrong with our bid?'

"'No.'

"'Prices O. K.?'

"'Yes; in fact, your figure is the lowest I received. But this is an important job. I can't take chances of not getting my materials on time. I'd give you the order quick enough; but—I've learned that Astrid Rosing is a woman.'

"The salesman seemed unable to get past that argument. I had to go in person to secure the contract.

"The point is, if I had been a man the question of ability to perform would never have come up. Because of this attitude, which was quite common when I first started out for myself, I had to take more than average pains to perform my contracts every time and never fall down on a single one; a failure would have been held against me for years.

"NOW, please don't think I have any hard feelings about this discrimination. I was in a business which was essentially a man's business, and in many ways I had to do better than a man in order to do as well as a man. Thus, there was a dealer who made a practice of calling me up on the telephone and giving me verbal lists of materials, rattling them off as fast as I could jot them down. He expected prices instantly. I knew exactly what he would think if I failed:

"'H'm! a woman! I've been expecting her to fall down!'

"In a man, he would have been satisfied to wait while something was looked up in the files. But I didn't mind. I took it as part of the job, received as fast as he sent, and when I did have to look something up, I kept right on talking while I was looking, and he never knew.

"Being expected to fall down led me, I think, to make special efforts to guard against such a contingency. I simply could not allow myself to fail. As a result, I often found myself unusually well equipped to handle emergencies. I remember one contractor asked me if I really believed I could handle his big job.

"'Yes,' I said, 'I can.'

"'But,' he announced, 'I've got to have eight carloads of sand and gravel shipped to-morrow!'

"'You'll have them.'

"And he did. I didn't depend on the telephone and promises. I got right on the train myself, went to my source of supplies, and stood over those eight cars while they were being loaded, and watched them sent off that night.

"Soon another difficult emergency job came my way. It was war-time. My telephone rang, and on the other end of the wire was the man who was rebuilding a powder plant which had been blown up. It was absolutely necessary that the plant

Up rises that sweet and tantalizing fragrance—the hot, spicy aroma of Heinz oven-baked beans—browned in heat flooded ovens. Flavor baked into them—flavor baked through and through them—from tender, golden skin to juicy, tomato-saucy center. They taste baked. They are baked. They're Heinz.

Sometimes, in talking about flavor, we feel as if we're sitting down in your kitchen and exchanging recipes . . . Naturally, we start with the beans—selecting them, sorting them. In fact, every bean is picked over twice, by hand—and you know what that means.

Then we insist that the beans must be really baked—baked in the dry heat of ovens. For oven baking is the only way you can have them mealy, tender, golden-brown in color, with that real nut-like taste. And remember only beans that are baked can be labeled "baked".

Then, of course, for the sauce we do supervise the growing of our own tomatoes, and use them fresh from the garden. . .

For care is important—the care with which we select our materials, the care with which we duplicate home methods of cooking . . . It is one of the many reasons why the Heinz name has come to mean Flavor.

JAPAN TEA

No drowsy afternoons

No mid-afternoon drooping. No four o'clock weariness!

For here's a way to ward it off. To keep you fresh and wide awake —every minute up to dinner time.

After luncheon, pause to linger over a cup of Japan Green Tea.

Drink it slowly. Enjoy its steaming fragrance. Relax. You'll get up refreshed and rested, with all your early morning energy.

Try it once or twice. After that you'll make it a daily habit.

Japan Tea is tea at its best, tea in its natural state, uncolored and unfermented, with all the flavor-laden juices of the fresh leaves preserved by immediate sterilization.

Specify Japan Green Tea when you buy. Packaged for the home under various well-known brands. Several grades and prices. The best you can buy will cost you only a fraction of a cent a cup be running full blast in a few weeks—powder was an imperative need. An extraordinary quantity and variety of sizes of sewer pipe was needed to carry off noxious fumes and chemical wastes. Somebody had said, 'Get Rosing!'

"'I'll be right out,' I promised.

"The plant was near Gary. I was shown through barbed wire guarded by soldiers. From rough, preliminary drawings, I got my specifications. Some of the pipe needed was large, some was small.

"Now, sewer pipe is manufactured from clay. Some clay banks are suited for making small pipe, but not large; and where the clay will make any size, the manufacturers will bother only with the larger sizes, which are more profitable. So it was a question of knowing where, beyond a shadow of doubt, each and every kind of pipe could be secured without a moment's delay, a matter I had studied for years. The result was, I ordered the pipe from seven different manufacturers. The order was signed on the fourteenth, the first carloads were shipped on the sixteenth, and the last on the thirtieth.

"One of the largest orders I ever secured came near to being one of my most serious disappointments—just because I was a woman. The construction was a big warehouse, one of the largest in the world, jointly put up by a number of companies. My bid secured the order. It was signed and in my possession, when I received a call from a man interested in the warehouse, the executive head of one of the large companies that owned it; he asked me to come to his office.

"Boston engineers had been given charge of the construction, and it was through them I had been given my contract. When I reached the owner's office I found perhaps a dozen men, including several of the engineers.

"'MISS ROSING,' said the owner, 'we have been going over matters, and have come to the conclusion that we'd like to be released from our contract with you.'

"Naturally, I was surprised, and wanted to know why they wished to be released. It developed that they were simply afraid a woman would be unable to live up to so large a contract, and would feel safer with a man. 'Twisting' an order out of my hands after I had secured it had been tried on me more than once, but never on an order so important as this. I used up all my arguments in vain. There were a dozen men against one woman, and finally I had to say:

"'Well, gentlemen, apparently there's only one thing left for me to do—release you. I haven't the order with me right now, but I'll send it back when I reach my office.'

"I retreated, considerably crestfallen but not beaten. I noticed that one of the engineers had seemed more kindly disposed than the others. When I reached my office I decided to make one more effort to save the order. I called this engineer on the 'phone.

"'Mr. Henderson,' I said, 'I've been thinking things over. I know I can deliver of course, or I wouldn't have taken the contract. But, what is more important for you, I doubt very seriously that anybody else in Chicago can deliver.

"'Here's what I suggest: Send a man to visit my sources of supply; I'll give you a list of them. Send the same man to visit the sources of my competitors. Then size up both, at my expense.

"'This will take a little time. I know you want to start work. So I'll supply you with fifteen or twenty carloads of material (as many as you need) until you make up your mind. If the investigation doesn't satisfy you, then I'll hand you back your order and not hold you to the contract.'

"'That,' he admitted, 'seems fair.'

"He did as I suggested, with the result I kept the contract. Before the warehouse was quite finished, Mr. Henderson put it into a letter that he never before had worked on a job where the sand and gravel were delivered so satisfactorily!"

And what about Mr. Sawyer, you say! I'm coming to him right now.

ONE DAY a dozen years ago a man named Sawyer, who had been in the steel business, dropped in to see Miss Rosing and accept what he supposed would be a temporary job.

"Golly!" he thought, upon seeing her, "here's a poor girl who has inherited a business from her father. She's trying to make a go of it; but it's bound to be too much for her."

It wasn't long before the young man discovered that first impressions aren't always correct. However, he liked his job so much that two years later he turned it into a permanent one by the simple process of persuading Astrid Rosing to tack Sawyer onto her name. However, Mrs. Sawyer is still boss of the business, still president of the company she founded, still the hardest-working individual on the premises. But her life is more full, richer, and more varied because she has linked her career with marriage.

"There has been a great change of attitude since I started in business," she reminded me. "At that time, a woman who did what I did was looked upon as a curiosity and that fact increased my difficulties.

"To-day, the woman in business—in her own business—is more common, and to-morrow she will be still more common. My experience has taught me what many men and women are only just learning, that a woman can be a good wife and mother, even though she engages in business or a profession. And, on the other hand, engaging in a business or profession need not mean giving up either wifehood or motherhood. The other day I met at luncheon a professional woman whom I have known for years: shortly before, she had left the hospital after giving birth to her second baby.

"'How,' somebody asked her, 'can you possibly carry along as a wife and mother, and keep up your profession too?'

"'I don't see,' she replied, 'how I could possibly get along in my profession without my husband and family!'

"I agree.

"People say to me:

"'But you can give so little time to your child!'

"By organizing her day, and being in a position to provide such help as she needs, a mother in business can give about as much of her time to her children as the average mother gives—at least, the mother who plays bridge, attends numerous luncheons, matinées, and the like.

Judge value by these things....

the opinion of fifty thousand discriminating users

THE General Electric Refrigerator is so simple that it hasn't a single exposed moving part. It hasn't a belt or a fan or a drain-pipe.... It has no connections or stuffing boxes. It never needs oiling because the hermetically sealed casing which holds all the mechanism also holds a permanent supply of oil.

Costs less to run

A specially designed motor of low horse power, but high efficiency, uses very little current. Then, too, the top unit design allows all the heat (extracted from the box and generated by the tiny motor) to be dissipated above the box—not to rise through it.

Unusually quiet

Standards of quietness vary so widely that we can only invite you to listen to the refrigerators yourself to find how quietly they operate.

Greater shelf area

The remarkable compactness of the freezing chamber gives each model a greater shelf area than any other refrigerator of the same over-all size.

Compare the cabinets

The strong, scientifically designed, attractive looking cabinets represent outstanding value. And all models up on legs, so that the floor under them may easily be cleaned.

Fifty thousand in service

Fifteen years of research in the General Electric laboratories have resulted in this revolutionary design. It was purely an electrical problem—and so was solved, as one would logically expect, by the world's outstanding group of electrical engineers and scientists. More than fifty thousand homes already enjoy General Electric refrigeration—the product of General Electric research—which is your greatest guarantee of value.

There is a wide range of models and prices. All are shown in booklet A-3 which will be sent on request.

Moreover, a mother in business looks forward eagerly to the time she can spend with her children, and tries to make the most of it; she is not very eager to give up that pleasure, and run off to the theatre or a dinner party, or some merely frivolous dissipation.

"Another great compensation I have discovered is that the keenness and zest I bring to my job give me a certain zest and keenness for every other activity I undertake. I feel alive; my interests are not restricted and confined within four walls.

"Some friends not in business say to me:

"'I see enough of my husband at home. I wouldn't want to see him at the office, too!'

"My husband and I are together nearly twenty-four hours of the day; yet we do not become bored. It is the lack of common interests, rather than seeing too much of each other, that causes boredom."

The size of Mrs. Sawyer's business today may be guessed by the fact that incoming orders average nearly three thousand dollars a day.

"But," she says emphatically, "don't run off with the notion that I rate things chiefly in dollars and cents. I don't. I rate values in hours lived, really lived. It doesn't matter to me that I now have so much and can do so and so. I am enormously interested in buying and selling—my job thrills me; but I am just as interested in giving a full measure of service, living a rich, full, bountiful existence, and, incidentally, proving to the world at large that a woman can be a good wife and mother as well as a business woman."

had been carrying on a musical conversation with the composer, I had been leaning forward with my elbows on the table keeping my eyes on the psychic. Wearied with this position I settled back into my chair.

Instantly, the tone of the spectral voice changed. A note of alarm, of entreaty, almost of agony, came into it: "GARLAND! GARLAND! Where are you? I can't see you. I can't see you."

Resuming my position above the table I answered, "Here I am." With a sigh of relief, of pleasure, the voice exclaimed, "Oh! Now I see you."

It was as if an X-ray spotlight had been beating down upon the table, and that my dead friend could see me only when my head came within that circle. I cannot say that it was not a little drama arranged by the psychic; but, taking it as it came, it was in direct contrast with the precision of perception which had placed the notes on the closed slates. In the one case darkness was no barrier, but in the other case sunlight was of no avail.

In a series of very recent experiments I have made further proof of this supranormal perception in the dark. In a room utterly strange to the medium, with her sleeves nailed to her chair, we set the stage for a display of this strange power. The psychic was not tied, she was nailed, hand and foot, and, in addition, her hands were controlled at every critical moment by myself and an expert connected with the police department.

Scooping up a handful of wooden letters, I placed them (without knowing what they were) in a basket on the floor in front of the psychic. She might possibly have been able to touch the basket with her toes; but that does not matter very much, as the reader will see later. After the lights were out, a voice—that of "Walter" the "guide"—suggested that the sitters place several small objects in a basket. Each sitter complied, and for the most part no one of us knew what the others had contributed. In my own case, confidently expecting to puzzle the guide, I put in a red poker chip, and a street railway metal token or coin, which had the letter W cut into its center. (The "W" stood for Washington, D. C.)

"I AM laying a trap for you," I said to Walter, and when he had successfully thrown from the basket and named every other article put in it, he came upon my poker chip. This he identified and threw out. But when I said, "Can you perceive color in the dark? What color is it?" he answered "Blue." This was wrong. All the other answers were right.

He then uttered a word of surprise. He had come upon my token and was handling it. After a pause, he said, "It is a coin about as big as a Canadian five-cent piece. He appeared to finger it a little longer. "You've got me now!" he exclaimed. "I can't make out the lines in the center. It seems to me like a Chinese coin."

I applauded him. "You're on the right track! Try again and tell me what is in the center." He had got very close to a perfect description, but he could not make out the letter cut into the metal. When I told him what it was, he grumbled, "How should I know that? I never was in Washington."

To advance such a common "explanation" as the one that the psychic had some kind of rod in her mouth which she used in picking up these objects seems absurd to me. Even if her foot was free to move, could she pick up with it a poker chip, a glass bottle? As for her hands—well, I can answer that they did not leave their fastenings, and that her left hand did not participate in the slightest degree in any action of the "spirit guide." Captain F, who was holding the other hand, similarly tacked to the chair, announced from moment to moment that there was no motion on that side.

A magnet might have acted on a piece of metal, but it would not engage the poker chip or the glass bottle, which were readily picked up and identified. No rod or other tool could have identified the coin and the poker chip.

If you ask me how it was done, I say frankly, "I don't know." Again and again the "guide" told me where to find objects thrown upon the floor or table. It would appear that he could see in the dark, and yet he announced each of his discoveries as though he had made them by feeling.

In the course of my study of "slate writing" I have read with care a great many confident exposures of the way in

Why restrict one of the nicest experiences of the week to

Sunday Night Only?

OFTEN on Sunday night there's a pick-up supper and so often it's more delicious than any other meal. It's apt to be "light" (and Dad probably does the dishes, of which there are as few as possible).

Almost always there's cocoa. It tastes so awfully good that it will be two cups rather than one. And fearlessly. For "cocoa won't keep you awake"—and it does "stick to the ribs." Satisfies.

This sensible and nourishing food is just as sensible and nourishing every night in the week!

A cup or two of Baker's is one of the kindest things you do to your digestion. For with its enticing smooth flavor, it feeds you almost perfectly, and supplies the body that is presently going to have a good night's sleep, with everything it can derive from a variety of good foods.

How to make a cup of Baker's.

The quickest and easiest way to make Baker's Cocoa is to put 4 tablespoons of cocoa and a cup of cold water into a saucepan. Stir it over heat until it is smooth; then let it boil two minutes. Then add three cups of milk, a dash of salt, and 2 to 4 tablespoons of sugar; heat it until it foams. Then beat it well, and serve at once. This makes about 4 cups.

Send for a generous sample.

See what Snider mulling does for catsup . . .

Wine of tomatoes gorgeously spiced!

HAVE you ever tasted catsup that is mulled the Snider way?

This marvellous method of blending spices with sun-ripened tomatoes has helped to put Snider's Catsup in a preferred class.

Preferred by those who want sparkling flavor, preferred by those who look for a condiment with a difference.

That all catsup does not taste alike is a discovery many people are surprised to make, the first time they try Snider's. But it is a familiar fact to the countless others who have been using this catsup for years and enjoying its distinctive flavor.

What do you think? Don't say "catsup" but say "Snider's", and put to the test its individuality of recipe and its delightful mulled blandness.

which the trick is done. These exposers made much of "prepared slates," "substitute slates" and the like; but none of these very obvious devices will explain the most puzzling of my experiments. Suppose we select a case in detail:

A friend once took me in his car, and said, "I am going to drop you at the corner of a street, a block away from the house in which an old psychic lives. I don't want her to know that I brought you. Knock at her door, and when she appears tell her that you have come for a sitting, and insist upon having it at once."

Leaving him in that side street, I sought the number. The house was a small wooden cottage, and the woman who came to the door reminded me of the Missouri mountaineer women. She was gaunt, sad, and rather repellent. She shook her head: "No, I can't do it," she said darkly. I urged that I had come a long way, and at last she said, "Come in. I'll see what I can do for you."

The house, scantily furnished with the very cheapest kind of furniture, was evidently the home of poverty. In the sitting-room, which faced the west, were several cheap upholstered chairs, and a square table with a chenille cover. The hour was about three of a summer afternoon and the room was brilliant with sunshine.

As we took seats at the table, I placed on its top the marked slates which I had brought with me, and waited. After a few minutes of silence, she said, "They are here."

At this moment ghostly "fingers" tapped me on the knee and the fringe of the table cover waved in and out. As the psychic started to put the slates under the table, I stopped her. "Don't do that. It's not necessary." I said derisively, "I am a psychic myself. Put them on the top of the table."

To my surprise, she obeyed me. "Lay your right hand on top of the slate," I went on. She did so, and I put my left hand on top of hers. With my right hand I then flung half of the chenille cover over the slate and our two hands, leaving her left hand in full view on the edge of the table.

In a few moments the writing began within the slates. I could plainly hear it. It went on slowly and for several minutes. At last a tapping indicated that it was finished. On opening the slates, I found them filled with messages which had no relationship to me, but seemed to be addressed to my friend who had brought me to the corner of the street.

Encouraged by my success I now said: "A cover is not necessary. I will place my left hand on the slate. Keep your right hand on mine, and we'll get the writing without darkness."

SHE did as I directed, and with her left hand in full view and with the slates under my own hand, I got the sound of writing on the slate. I could feel the vibration of the pencil, which was only a small point. It was one of the finest demonstrations of slate writing I had ever had; but when I opened the slates and read the lines written there, I found them of no especial significance to me. They still had to do with the man out on the corner.

With a tone of intense conviction I now said, "Really, Mrs. Ring, it is not necessary for either of us to touch the slates. It is evident that you and I form a powerful battery. We'll put the slates down on the table and let the writing go on by itself."

It did! With both the psychic's hands in sight, with nothing touching the slates, the writing went on.

I observed, however, a minute twitching of small muscles in the back of the psychic's left hand. These twitchings appeared to be synchronous with the strokes of the pencil inside the folded slates. As I bent over the table, listening intently, the psychic with the thumb of her left hand lifted the top slate on its hinge, letting in the light. And still the writing went on.

Bending over the slates I almost—but not quite—caught the pencil in action. It stopped as the upper slate was raised about three inches. This message, like the others, was of no significance, but the way of its production was highly satisfactory. It will not do to say I was hypnotized, for the writing was there.

Mrs. Ring now proposed that we try for voices, and led the way to a poor little bare room which she had darkened for the purpose. It was absolutely bare of furnishing, with the exception of two wooden chairs and three tin cone-shaped trumpets, which rested upright on the floor. There was no closet, no screen, no place for machinery. Closing and locking the door myself, I took a seat opposite her and placed my toes firmly on the tips of her shoes, and told her to give me her hands. This she did and I turned out the light.

AFTER a few moments she began to sing a hymn in a most lamentable voice. At the end of a verse or two she stopped, and the cones began to jostle one another. At length one of them rose with a whisk, and began to float above me. I could see it plainly, for there was a large crack under the door, and the light of the afternoon sun reflected from the bottom of the floating cone so that it resembled a golden dragonfly as it silently revolved above me. It came down at last and passed so near my face that, by bending forward slightly, I was able to touch it with my forehead.

This seemed to short-circuit its power. It dropped to the floor and for some moments remained quiescent. Several times this was repeated, while I controlled the hands and feet of the psychic. My conviction is that she had no more to do (in a normal way) with the floating of that cone than I had.

This woman was poor, illiterate, hard-working, and religious. To her, apparently, these phenomena were connected up with life after death. To me, they were curious facts of a purely biologic nature. I had no feeling that a discarnate personality was present. If these were tricks the sorceress was poorly paid for her skill.

As a physical demonstration, this séance does not stand alone. It is only one of a long list of similar experiments, and it has been followed by many others equally convincing. I still maintain the scientific attitude. Nothing stands alone. One experiment explains another.

I was now interested in seeing how profoundly I could influence the psychic to alter her routine. In a dozen other cases, I had dictated (after the slates were under my hands) the words to be written or the markings to be made. In one case I even suggested the color of the drawing as well as its shape, at a time when no colored chalk or pencil had been placed between the slates. At the same time that I dictated the color of the drawing, in another corner of the slate a few flowers were drawn, also in color. These appeared beneath the hands of a friend who was sitting with me.

In the literature of this subject there is occasional talk of the fourth dimension as a possible explanation of some of the more startling physical phenomena, and many tests have been worked out in the light of this theory. It has not helped me.

In going over my records recently, I came upon the following brief note which I give for what it is worth:

April 13th. After dining with Dr. T, a well-known New York physician, I joined in a sitting with a young psychic named D. He did marvelous things. While all our hands were tightly knit around the circle, the table was lifted out over our shoulders, fists drummed on the table, fingers wrote with pencils on a pad on the table and touched those who sat nearest the psychic. Two of these mysterious hands took off Dr. T's collar and tie, and put them about Mrs. T's neck, and finally, at my suggestion, took off the psychic's vest. All these phenomena took place while the chain of hands was complete. At other stages of the séance lights were seen floating across the curtains of an alcove, broad, brilliant, glowing flames. That these phenomena were all genuine, I have no doubt, but in my judgment they all came from the psychic, not from the spirit world.

The above lines were written immediately after the performance and but feebly represent my interest. All of those present were mystified by the happenings. Later, I added this comment: "The removal of the vest was suggested by me. I alluded to some of Zollner's experiments and spoke of the removal of a psychic's coat while his hands were held. Our psychic said, "They have done that with me." I then said, "If they could remove your vest, it would be a fine test of the fourth dimension theory." I was only bantering him; but a few moments afterward, while Dr. T reported a complete control of hands, the psychic said, "They are working around me," and almost immediately something soft fell into my lap. It was the man's vest!

"Consider what this means," I set down in my diary. "It means that to perform this trick, the psychic must free both hands three times—once to get his coat off, once to get his vest off, and a third time to get his coat back on. Nevertheless, Dr. T reported to us that his fingers never released their grip on those of the psychic."

A month later I made this note: "We went again to Dr. T's house to have another sitting with D. Not much happened; but what did happen was under test conditions. While the psychic's coat sleeves were nailed to the chair and his hands held by myself and Dr. T, hands developed out of a cloud of smoke before his breast, and writing appeared on a pad in the middle of the table."

ALTHOUGH it does not appear in this brief note, I had, as an extra precaution, tied the psychic's wrists with dental floss. Nevertheless, while my little finger was tightly linked with his, I saw a partly-formed hand reach out for a glass of water, lift it to his lips, and replace it on the table. A powerful hand gripped me by the wrist and another ruffled my coat cuff with vigorous action, and presently the psychic's undershirt was removed!

Of course we examined the psychic's vest and the undershirt. They appeared perfectly normal garments with no trick slits or seams. They were as complete and genuine as my own, so far as I could discover. I don't know that the psychic had an undershirt on when he arrived, but I met him in the hall as he entered the house and examined his pockets. It was in summer and he wore a light coat. To conceal an undershirt would have been possible but not easy. But, granting that he had the shirt concealed about his person, I cannot see how he managed to take it from his pocket. Dental floss cannot be untied and retied by mortal fingers. It is more faithful than a handcuff and resents contortions of any sort. I proved that the man had no undershirt on after the sitting, for I accompanied him into another room and saw him resume his missing garment.

However, we'll let that stand as an amazing trick; but how shall we explain his supernumerary hands, one of which I saw and felt? How shall we account for the lifting of the glass of water by a pale-white three-fingered vaporous rod?—I saw this plainly, and I saw phantasmal hands dart out of a cloud of vapor swift as the tongues of serpents. How shall we explain the writing which he reproduced on the pad in the middle of the table while I held his hands and his wrists were nailed to the chair?

CONSIDER another occurrence: The psychic said to Dr. T, "Think of a signature, any signature—keep it clearly in your mind, and I will place it on the pad in the middle of the table."

This he did for Dr. T and for several others of us. Furthermore, hands could be heard at work on the pad and tearing off its sheets. One sheet thrown over to me bore a message from a friend whose writing was peculiar, a man whom the psychic could not possibly have known, even by name, for he was a teacher in a small Western school. How could the psychic apprehend writing he had never seen, and reproduce it on a sheet of paper which he could not touch?

It was professedly a "stunt." He did not say to Dr. T, "The spirit of your dead brother will reproduce his signature for you." He said, "I will do it." I believe that it was a biological and not a spiritualistic phenomenon. I don't see how the theory of the fourth dimension helps, but to explain such things we need the help of something more than we can at present command. I once had several leaves torn from a pad under similar test conditions, fastened together with a pin and laid on a sofa seventy-two inches from the tips of the psychic's fingers, whose wrists were encircled with tape nailed to her chair.

"But why all these stunts?" I hear my readers repeating. "Haven't the 'spirits' anything better to do than to reproduce mental signatures and take a man's undershirt off?"

They have. And it is only fair to say that not all of the "guides" busy them-

You Can Be One of a Happy Group Like This

A little practice, a lesson or two, and you can be one of a happy group like this. Then: friends, good times, a popular position in community affairs, will be yours. And the music you, yourself, produce will become one of the most pleasurable and beneficial influences of your life.

selves with astonishing us. Most of them do, however, on the theory (so they urge) that only in this way can they arrest our attention and shake us out of our philosophical complacency. Let us grant that this is their motive, and make whatever we can out of their tricks. Furthermore, we must remind ourselves that we ourselves almost always demand these marvels at their hands.

It is not true to say that the "spirits" do nothing and say nothing sensible. I have conversed for hours with "spirit voices" who discussed philosophical themes with intellectual acuteness; but I have observed that the speech of the disembodied takes color from the composition of the circle of sitters. A group of illiterates will get low-brow messages, an intellectual group will find the visiting spirits able to enter upon long descriptions of the difficulties involved in conveying to our plane the attributes of life on theirs.

WE COME now to the consideration of the intelligences manifesting in these mysterious ways. Are they spirits, or are they secondary personalities of the psychic? Are we concerned with the realms of the dead, or with unexplored fields of biology. Many careful investigators have worked for years with no conviction that they were dealing with spirits, and I must confess that there is not sufficient weight of evidence in my records to give me that sense of certainty which is required.

For two years Sir William Crooks walked and talked with one of these phantasmal entities. He took her pulse beat, examined her eyes and hair, comparing them with those of the psychic who "produced" her. He photographed her many times—several times with the psychic in view—and yet he did not (as I recall his words) definitely call this personality a spirit. He made the tests in his own house; he had no doubt of the reality of the phenomena, but he was not convinced of the spirit personality. He regarded it as born of the psychic's body and mind. Richet, Maxwell, Morselli, Geley are, as I read them, of the same mind.

In my own case, while holding long talks with "spirit voices," and feeling on the friendliest terms with the "personalities" behind them, I have never had the conviction, not for a single moment, that I was in the presence of a person who had been through the experience of death. I have always felt that the voice was somehow a reflection from the medium, and that the personality had to do with a secondary-self built up by long years of practice in self-surrender.

This is sufficiently mystifying. As Botazzi said, after years of research in his own laboratory, "I see no present solution of the puzzle."

It is true that the "guide" persists that he has memory and personality; but that proves nothing beyond the fact that the medium has memory and that her secondary-self partakes of that memory. These astounding "stunts" prove nothing, except that we know very little of the capabilities of the human organism. I do not say that they cannot prove survival after death, but up to the present moment all I have experienced and all I have read have failed to convince me. As Richet said, "We cannot will to believe." We must have sufficient weight of evidence to pull down one scale and elevate the other.

Take, for example, the very latest development, the obtaining of photographs of the spirit hand making thumb prints of the "spirit guide." Is this, in truth, any more convincing than a signature obtained in the middle of a pad without contact by the medium?

This has happened. In a series of experiments still going on, an ectoplasmic hand has been photographed in the act of making prints on wax and on paper, prints which are neither those of the psychic's hands nor of the sitters'.

In one of my own experiments, with the psychic's left hand in mine and her sleeve nailed to the chair as I have described, we obtained the print of a left-hand thumb—a print which was not made by any hand in the circle, and certainly not by the psychic. In this work I had the assistance of a finger-print expert, and his declaration was that this print was that of the spirit guide "Walter." He bases this statement on the fact that the dead man, Walter C., had left on a razor handle, just before his death, the print of his thumb. This print of the living thumb has been compared with the prints being made from time to time on wax and on paper by the phantasmal thumb of the spirit guide, and found identical. Nevertheless, I remained unconvinced. I do not doubt the truth of the phenomena; but as proof that the spirit of a dead man was doing the business it has too little weight to bring belief to my skeptical mind.

THE position I take is that all hypotheses of a biologic nature should be exhausted before passing on to those of spirit return. We are in a material world. Before us stretches a mysterious and never-ending field of discovery, and we should keep our feet on the earth as long as we can. I am so constituted that I am averse to soaring while I can walk or progress by motor car. I may be forced ultimately to profess that spirits return from the other side of death, but at present I am the investigator, the reasoner, the plodder. Sometime, no doubt, the ultimate mystery will be proved. I hope to be able to return, but as to that . . .

Well, that is what we are trying to prove.

FROM the day that his gallant ship nosed into the harbor of Domino Run, on the Labrador Coast, Wilfred T. Grenfell, the famous Labrador doctor, has led a life of hardship, stirring adventure and selfless service. To-day, dotted along the six hundred miles of Labrador coast are hospitals, orphanages, schools, a seamen's institute and other centers, as testimony of thirty-five years of marvelous medical missionary work. Next month we give the high lights of the personal story of this "Knight of the Sea"—an amazing record, so rich in interest and incident that it was extremely difficult to get it within the confines of an article.

quadrangle at the gray walls, on top of which the guards slowly paced with their rifles.

"I know how you feel, John," Matt said. "But you mustn't worry about me. In the first place, I'm not worth it, and, in the second place, it ain't so bad"—Matt paused, and then went on—"after the first night. It's when you're locked in for the first time." Matt paused and himself looked out across the quadrangle. "After a while, you get kind o' used to it; there's a kind of routine, a monotony, that ain't so bad—when you learn to stop thinking. That's the hardest; to learn to stop thinking, to stop remembering, to stop hoping."

"Don't say that, Matt!" exclaimed Blake. "You mustn't stop hoping!"

But Matt shook his head. "There's nothing in that any more, John, for me. I tell you, John," he said, looking carefully all about to be sure that no one was in sight, and then, leaning more closely, and speaking out of the side of his mouth, as he used to, "I tell you," he whispered, "this place is a hell! It ain't Sam's fault; he's as good a warden as you could find anywhere; it ain't anybody's fault; it's the system.

"For me, of course, it's made easy. Sam's been awful good to me. I've got no kick coming; I've only got what was coming to me—not enough, when I think of how I treated you; but when I think of those poor fellows in there," and Matt waved his hand at the dingy shop windows all around the quadrangle, "I'm ashamed of myself—to think how much better off I am than they are, and how I don't deserve it."

BLAKE turned and looked at Matt, looked him in the eyes, and, speaking slowly, said:

"Matt, I'm going to pardon you."

Matt stared, smiled, and then the smile faded, and he said:

"John, you're going to do no such thing."

"Why not?"

"Because I won't have it; I wouldn't accept it."

"But listen, Matt. I can't stand it to think of you in this place, after all the years we've been friends, and worked together in politics. I can't stand it! I want you to file an application with the Pardon Board—"

"John," cried Matt, interrupting him, "I'll do no such thing! Why, don't you know, man, that it would be political suicide for you?"

"Well, what of it?" Blake turned and faced him, and over Matt's large face stole an expression of perplexity.

"I don't know what's got into you, John," he said. "You always had good political horse sense before, except once, and that was when you appointed me."

"Matt, you told me a while back that sometimes, when you thought of those other fellows up there, and of how much better off you were than they, you felt ashamed of yourself, and that you don't deserve the privileges you have. Well, that's just the way I feel when I think of What Worlds She'll Conquer!

Your little girl . . . for her you have dreamed and planned as you watched her unfold . . . to her you are giving every opportunity that lies in your power to give.

In every child . . . boy or girl . . . there runs an instinctive urge to musical self-expression. Give your child the opportunity to develop this inborn desire through the piano, the natural, logical musical instrument.

Of all the accomplishments that enhance the loveliness of womanhood the ability to play the piano is perhaps the finest. Give your daughter the means to acquire this accomplishment. What worlds she'll conquer!

A GOOD PIANO, like every other product of quality, is subject to the inroads of time and use. Proper tuning two to three times a year will prolong the musical life of your piano. If your piano is too old, you should consider exchanging it for a new instrument. Don't expect your child to get the most out of music on an antiquated piano.

FAMOUS FEET

..how they're kept free from corns

BEATRICE ROBERTS' Famous Feet

"I adore pets! Horses, dogs and kittens. But I have no use for a pet corn."

So writes Beatrice Roberts . . . the charming Miss Manhattan.

"In these days a corn seems like a silly grievance . . . with a drug store on almost every corner and Blue-jay as easy to get as postage stamps."

Always the safest and gentlest way to end a corn, Blue-jay for 1928 offers new refinements. A creamy-white pad instead of a blue one. A more flexible disc for the awkwardly placed corn. And a new and improved package! . . . One plaster usually ends the corn. But even the rugged "old-timer" seldom needs more than two . . . you. Only, in my case, it's worse, for, if it hadn't been for you, I should never have been where I am.

"Think of all those years we spent together in politics—wasn't I in it all as deep as you? Didn't we share in all the—I don't like to use the word, but we might as well call things by their right names—I mean all the crooked deals that landed me at last in the governor's chair? What you did began away back there in Allen County, and I have my share in the guilt, whatever it is. It isn't fair for you to stand the punishment all alone."

"But you got nothing out of this last deal," argued Matt. "You've been straight."

"Yes, I've been straight enough since I became governor. But, Matt, I've had a kind of new light, lately. It came to me gradually—what I ought to be, what I might have been."

"Yes, I know," said Matt, reflectively. "I remember that last speech of yours."

"Yes, and I think of it in the night sometimes. I see things pretty clearly then. I see that, in a way, I was responsible for this thing that you did; it was all of one piece, don't you see?"

"Because you appointed me?" asked Matt, sharply.

Blake hesitated, and then said:

"Yes, for one thing, though that isn't all. Anyway, I decided—and I'm going to pardon you."

MATT bent over, his elbows on his knees, and smoked reflectively for a few moments. Blake watched him. From time to time, Matt studiously examined the end of his almost finished cigar, turning it about in the tips of his fingers.

"John," said Matt, still stooping over, looking meditatively at his cigar, and speaking in a tone that Blake recognized as the one Matt always used when he had something embarrassing to say, "I've been for you all my life."

"I know that, Matt."

"Been for you. And the only way I can be for you now is to stay right here, where I am."

Matt reluctantly flung his cigar away on the gravel walk, and then, suddenly sitting up straight, fixed his eyes on Blake. And Blake became uneasily conscious of that odd sensation which Matt had the power to produce in him, that feeling of helpless acquiescence in the presence of a superior will.

"John," said Matt, "you're morbid. You've got your head filled up, somehow, with some kind of fancies. Cut it out—get rid of them. And, listen; don't you ever breathe the word pardon to anyone, not even to me, again. I won't have it, I tell you!"

"But suppose, Matt, I have one made out, and sign it anyhow?"

"Well, if you do that, I will decline to accept it—and what kind of a position will you be in then? You'd look nice, wouldn't you?"

Matt waited a moment, and then said, with a definitive air:

"No, John. You can't afford to pardon me. You're not going to—and that's all there is to it. You hear?"

And Blake, under the irresistible compulsion of Matt's will, lowered his eyes and with his stick drew crude designs in the gravel at his feet.

A whistle blew—noon—the rumbling of the machines in the shops subsided into a hum and died away, in relief, like a sigh. Silence lay on the prison; the September sun glittered on the stark yard, and touched the black limbs of the thorn tree to a faded, rusty green. Long files of convicts in gray, formed before each shop, in companies, mustered by their guards, and stood, mute and motionless, waiting for the order to march to their noon-day meal.

"You won't want to see that," said Matt. "Let's go in."

"No," said Blake. "I don't want to see them. I guess I'd better be going."

IT WAS a relief to get away from those dismal precincts, to sink back on the cushions in the motor and be driven up out of that ugly part of town to the broad, busy streets of the business section, where there was life, and those crowds hurrying along High Street to luncheon. He would, after all, stop a moment at the State House, just to see if there was anything new, if anything had happened. Of course, the reporters would be there, waiting; but, no matter. . . .

Yes, there they were, headed by the representative of "The Star," that little whipper-snapper with the eyeglasses, the gold chain over his ear, and the cigarette.

"Governor, what was the purpose of your visit to the Penitentiary this morning?"

"I went out on a little visit of inspection," replied Blake.

"Whom did you see?"

"Well, I saw the warden, and a lot of convicts."

"Did you see Matt Holt?"

"Yes."

"Is it true that you are going to pardon him out?"

"No," Blake replied, shaking his head; "I am not going to grant him a pardon." And Blake turned away and went into his private room.

The reporter looked disappointed and rather unconvinced, then hurried away to the telephone. Squire and Doc Sloane, who were standing by, smiled with pleasure at his discomfort.

Rather good, that reply; that is, it had become quite true since he had talked with Matt that morning. But were there never to be any circumstances or conjunctures in which he could speak without seeming to be, to himself at least, a kind of hypocrite? Was there no escape?

As he walked slowly down the wide steps of the State House to the waiting motor, the newsboys were rushing up with the noon editions. Two men were coming down the steps behind him; one of them bought a newspaper, and read out the headline: "No Pardon for Big Matt."

"Well," Blake heard the man say to his companion, "we haven't had such a strong governor in many a long year. He reminds me of old Elijah Gates!"

Blake couldn't help glancing 'round; but, not wishing the man to know that he had heard him, he hastily looked up at the dome, rising above him, tapering with a curious effect of perspective from its monstrous base to the small pinnacle of its lantern, soaring in the pale, satiny September sky.

I'LL PAY 100 MEN The Same Money I Pay Louis George

$10,000 a year is what I pay Louis George, Illinois. I now need 250 more men who can earn from $6,500 to $10,000 a year in my organization.

STEADY WORK ASSURED at BIG PAY

Our new expansion program calls for an immediate addition of 250 reliable men to fill good money-making territories. Permanent, big pay positions await the successful applicants. No experience necessary—we will give a complete training in Fire Prevention. Our plans make it possible for the men to get started in a business of their own without capital. New, amazing invention replaces old type extinguishers everywhere. Allowance made for old equipment taken in. You can sell equipment on credit; we protect you against losses.

QUICK PROMOTIONS

Our men are given promotion to distributors as soon as they make good. Our organization is known as one of the country's highest paid sales organizations. We give you the training and cooperation that is responsible for this reputation. Every representative furnished with complete profit making plan worked out by experts.

BROAD MARKET

FYR-FYTER has universal acceptance—see list of customers on this page. We have a type of extinguisher to fit every type of hazard. Every school, store, hotel, home, hospital or factory is a prospect.

L. D. Payne, Iowa, earned $4,500 his first 200 days; Viles, Wisconsin, sold $50,000 in one year—many others averaging $6,500 to $10,000 a year. We will show you how to make this income.

The Most Annoying Person I Know

FIRST PRIZE

My Kid Sister Sure Does Get My Goat

I'M CERTAINLY glad of a chance to let off steam about the most annoying person I know. My ten-year-old sister fits that description absolutely. I'm thirteen and a sophomore in high.

Why, yesterday, she was sitting on a board spanning a deep ditch that runs past our house, sawing the board in two. Rather than mind me and get off, when I told her to, she stayed right there sawing until it broke with her and she fell in, sawing some of herself when she fell. I got the blame, of course.

Her yellow cat is so full of fleas that you can see them jumping around on it from clear across the room. Almost, anyway. She gave it a bath in strong lysol water to deflea it, then turned down the covers of my bed and put it in to warm it and get it dry, although her own bed stands on the other side of the same room. The strong fumes of lysol nearly overpowered me. I had to sleep on the extreme edge of the bed to keep out of the wet spot, and, lastly, it must take something stronger than lysol water to deflea a cat, because I felt living fleas in my bed all night.

If Father or Mother ever ask each other what a word means, she will say, "Oh, don't bother to look it up, just ask the 'walking dictionary'." Or "the living encyclopedia"—just because I told her that f-a-t-i-g-u-e spelled fatigue and not fat-ig-you, as she has been pronouncing it.

She said last night that she would help me with a cross-word puzzle that I'm making. I had come to a place where the word airedale would fit nicely if it hadn't been for the last "e." Said my bright little sister, "Well, tell 'em that that word would mean a kind of dog if it had an 'e' on the end of it." And she meant it, too. Good night! J. E. H.

SECOND PRIZE

Miss B Yearns to Save Us From Our Wicked Ways

THE most annoying person I know is the very best young woman I ever met. She is so determinedly good, upright, and cheerful, so patently a paragon of all the virtues, that my bristles rise every time she comes near me, and I am conscious of an overwhelming desire to do something mean.

In the privacy of our home, this young woman is called "The Voice in the Wilderness," because she first called herself that, and because she is so set upon "making straight the way of the Lord" out here in this wicked, wild, and woolly West.

Miss B is good. I admit it. She's sweet, quiet, refined, gentle, religious. She sings better than anyone else. She talks better, standing straight and slim with head uptilted as if just about to take wing and fly to some place more suited to her—and I wish she would.

She is a school-teacher, and is always correcting someone in her gentle, bright, angelic way. I hate her like poison when she does; but don't dare, or am not mean enough, to call her down when she says: "My father always told we girls." But I dream of it, picturing that glorious time when I shall rise in the majesty of all my hurt feelings and avenge them at one fell blow in front of all her admirers.

I don't dare to attend prayer-meeting when she is likely to be there, for I am in danger of crowning her with the heaviest hymn book I can lay hands on.

I have times of repenting. I determine to walk in paths of righteousness and not be annoyed by Miss B any more. Then I attend some gathering, and she invariably takes it upon herself to tell us sweetly just how she came to be good, so that we may go and do likewise.

Smash! All my good resolutions have gone by the board. I wish I was just ten, so I could stick out my tongue at her.

No, it's not just jealousy of her goodness. She affects others the same way. My Scandinavian neighbor says:

"She's too blamed good. When I get through talkin' to her I go outside an' cuss so's to even things up a little." B. H. G.

THIRD PRIZE

Aunt Jennie Has a Martyr Complex

AUNT JENNIE is the dearest of old ladies. We all love her—except when she assumes her martyr rôle, suffers in silence, and then tells us of her sufferings.

Aunt Jennie would die before she'd express a wish or a preference.

"Don't pay any attention to me," she'll tell us; "anything is all right for an old woman like me, just so the rest of you are suited." And then, when it's too late, we learn that it wasn't all right—was very wrong, in fact, though we had done not what we wanted but what we believed would suit Aunt Jennie.

"I'm nearly ill with nervousness," she said once last summer after a long auto ride. "It always makes me nervous to ride in the front seat." We all blushed guiltily, until we remembered that we'd begged her to sit wherever she wished, and after she'd meekly declared that anywhere was good enough for an old woman like her, we'd given her the place we all coveted.

Purchasing a gift for Aunt Jennie is an ordeal. For weeks before the event to be thus celebrated we try to trap her into saying what she'd like. We treasure her words, and do our best to interpret them. Finally, we spend more than we can afford, and hope for the best.

"It's thoughtful of you to remember a poor old woman." Aunt Jennie will say. "The gift is beautiful, but—" And then comes the joker. She never wears that color; she doesn't read that author; she's stopped eating candy.

Of course these are little things, and Aunt Jennie is a dear; but sometimes I wish she'd exchange her little habit for mayhem or bank robbing. A. M.

Restful Sleep

Wide-Awake Days

for busy people

A new Swiss food-drink . . . a natural way to sound restful sleep that stores up all-day energy

See what 3 days will do

When you go to bed do your nerves stay up? Leaving you dragged out on the morrow—your mornings logy, your energy drained by afternoon?

Modern science has found a way to overcome this—without the use of drugs. For drugs do not give the kind of sleep that refreshes. They always leave you "logy" and befuddled when you awaken.

But this unique Swiss food-beverage—called Ovaltine—gives you sound, restful sleep in a natural way. And as you sleep peacefully, the special food properties of Ovaltine restore your tired mind and body. Thus you get the kind of sleep that builds up new vitality and tireless energy.

Morning finds you a new man. Fresh, clear-eyed, buoyant. You have the energy to carry you right through the day and into the evening.

We offer you here a 3-day test so that you can prove what we claim. Note, especially, how good you feel when you awaken in the morning.

Why Ovaltine brings restoring sleep

Authorities agree that digestive unrest is the main cause of sleeplessness. Ovaltine overcomes this condition in two ways:

First—It digests very quickly itself. Even in cases of impaired digestion.

Second—It has the unusual power of digesting 4 to 5 times its weight of other foods you eat. Hence, it aids your stomach. Digestion goes on speedily and efficiently. Frayed nerves are soothed. Sound sleep follows.

And as you sleep, the special food properties of Ovaltine also help to restore your tired mind and body. (One cup of Ovaltine has actually more food value than 12 cups of beef extract, 7 cups of cocoa, or 3 eggs.)

That is why, after drinking a cup of hot Ovaltine at night, you awaken in the morning so completely refreshed—abounding with vigor and energy. Note the unsolicited testimonials below.

Hospitals and Doctors recommend it

Ovaltine has been in use in Switzerland for over 30 years. Now in universal use in England and her colonies. During the great war it was served as a standard ration to invalid soldiers.

A few years ago Ovaltine was introduced into this country. Today hundreds of hospitals use it. More than 20,000 doctors recommend it. Not only for sleeplessness, but because of its special dietetic properties, they also recommend it for nerve-strain, malnutrition, underweight and delicate children, nursing mothers and the aged.

Make this 3-day test

Just make a 3-day test of Ovaltine. Note the difference, not only in your sleep, but also in the way you feel in the morning. You tackle your work with greater vigor. You "carry through" for the whole day. You aren't too tired to go out for the evening. There's a new zest to your work; to all your daily activities. It's truly a "pick-up" drink—for any time of the day. Druggists and grocers sell Ovaltine in 4 sizes for home use. Or get it at the soda fountain. But to let you try it, we will send a 3-day introductory package for 10c to cover cost of packing and mailing. Just send in coupon with 10c.

Refreshed—when you first awaken

Do you find it an effort to get up in the morning? Ovaltine gives you the kind of sleep that overcomes that "logy" feeling. You wake up clear-eyed, clear-headed. Mr. O'Connor says: "I used to be tired out after a day's work in my office, too tired even to sleep. Now, thanks to Ovaltine, I sleep soundly and wake up in the morning fresh, clear and full of energy."

E. H. O'Connor
New York City

Ambitious Days the reward of restful sleep

A cup of hot Ovaltine before retiring usually brings instant, all night sleep . . . . sleep that gives you unlimited energy. "Keeps you on your toes" all day. Mr. Knox states: "I had not had restful sleep in over five years. Since taking Ovaltine I sleep better and have more ambition to work. It makes sleep come naturally."

George Knox
Burlington, Vt.

Gayer Evenings when vitality is high

Ovaltine gives you deep, restful sleep that seems to store up unlimited energy. You never seem to tire even after a hard day's work. Mr. McCauley writes: "I took Ovaltine for sleeplessness and found I slept better and felt 50% better. I feel as good after a hard day's work as I do in the morning."

When You Pay for Experience Be Sure to Keep Your Receipt!

succession of odd jobs during vacations, and then, when Elmer was fifteen and in high school, he landed what was in the eyes of the village an extremely important post. He became night operator on the Miamisburg telephone exchange.

"This was my first experience in dealing directly with the public," he told me with a small-boy grin, "and it gave me considerable practice in the art of being tactful. In the evenings, the work was not heavy, but I surely had to hump myself during what somebody has called the 'wee sma' hours' of the morning. I went on at nine-thirty in the evening and the farmers, who numbered three fourths of our subscribers, were in bed by that time. So, in addition to snatches of study between calls, I usually got in two good hours with my books before my bedtime.

"In those days, folks in the Miami Valley were early risers. Calls started coming in at three in the morning, and they kept piling in thick and fast until five or six o'clock. Sometimes subscribers had nothing more important on their minds than swapping views about the weather, but of course the majority of calls were to confirm tentative engagements made the day or the week before for sowing, reaping, hog-killing, or fishing. There was one old codger who made it a rule to call me every morning a little after three, Sunday or Monday, rain or shine. His only object was to see if 'thet young whippersnapper wuz on the job.'

"I HELD on to my night operator job two years, until I finished high school. Meanwhile, during vacations, I had been working as a full-time lineman for the telephone company. In all, I had saved up six hundred dollars. During the summer, my duties were what you might call miscellaneous in nature. I dug post holes, helped erect poles, strung lines, and installed instruments. It was pretty heavy work for a boy, but it was good for me.

"Personally, I don't think anything can take the place of a reasonable amount of manual labor in the life of a growing boy. If he is going to sit in an office all the rest of his days, all the more reason why he should get a taste of working with his hands. In the first place, the strenuous exercise in the open air will build into him endurance, tough muscles, and a digestion that will form an invaluable reserve in later, less active years. And, in the second place, his own first-hand experience will give him a healthy respect for the vast amount of this world's work which will always be done by the man who handles the business end of a shovel."

After his graduation from high school, young Biechler looked about him for a real job. He had decided against college, for the simple reason that what was going on outside college halls interested him more than what was going on inside them.

"Not that I would advise anybody to follow my example," he warned. "If a young chap has no idea what he wants to do when he finishes high school, I'd say he is as likely to find out in college as in any other place. But if a boy is definitely interested in some line of work, and he is not interested in books, then by all means I would urge him to find a job and roll up his sleeves. If he later decides that he needs more schooling to handle the kind of work he wants to do, the college will be right there where he left it. And this time he will have a clear-cut notion of what he wants to get out of it.

"And yet, if I am going to be perfectly honest, I must admit that, personally, there are a thousand times and a thousand places when I keenly feel the lack of the important 'something' one gets at college. Any man who has not been to college will know what I mean.

"YOU remember I told you," he reminded me, "that nearly every time I changed jobs, I passed up a higher salary for a lower one, because I wanted more job even if I got less pay? Well, when I finished high school, the telephone company wanted to keep me on as lineman, bill collector, and general utility man. They offered me good money; but I didn't stay, because the top of a telephone company was about as far as I could see myself climbing in that little local company. I didn't care where I started, but I wanted plenty of elbow room above me.

"Like most country boys, I now turned my eyes cityward. And to me, the city meant Dayton, which was only ten miles away. I had noticed in a Dayton paper the advertisement of a company which manufactured clay-working machinery. These folks wanted a shipping clerk. The pay was five dollars a week, which was less than half what the telephone company was offering me. But I was bent on getting a start in the city, so I went to Dayton and applied for the place.

"I got the job all right, but I'll admit that I was disappointed when I found that in the main my duties consisted of writing out shipping tags by hand. Still, I had gumption enough to know that a concern worth working for wasn't going to take a green country boy barely out of high school and make him vice president right off the bat. Then I remembered my old slogan of 'Dogged does it!' and I sailed in."

"And in the meantime," I suggested, "what had become of your six hundred dollars?"

Mr. Biechler grinned.

"Lost it," he said. "Nearly forgot to tell you about that. Just before I left for Dayton, the building and loan association in which I had invested all my capital collapsed. At the advanced age of seventeen I had to start life all over again."

"Weren't you awfully upset over your bad luck?" I demanded.

"Not a bit of it," he laughed. "You see, I had already figured out that you can make an experience worth whatever it costs you. Here's the heart of my business philosophy in a nutshell: I'm willing to pay the price for anything I learn; but I

When you sail on American ships to Europe

YOUR trip abroad on any American liner today is like a week's visit in a first class, modern American hotel. These ships belong to you—they constitute the American way to Europe.

The flagship, S. S. Leviathan, is the largest and best known ship in the world. The stewards are as polite as only perfect stewards can be, the cuisine is world-famous, your stateroom is a marvel. A little over five days, glorious days of sea and sun, from New York to Cherbourg and Southampton.

The S. S. George Washington is now a most attractive cabin ship—the largest in the fleet—with the same first class luxuries as before, but with rates very much reduced. Triple promenade decks, and nearly all outside staterooms. Sailing from New York to Plymouth, Cherbourg, and Bremen.

Reservations on the sister ships, S. S. President Roosevelt and S. S. President Harding, as well as on the S. S. Republic, are always in demand among cabin class passengers. From New York to Cobh (Queenstown), Plymouth, Cherbourg, and Bremen. The beautifully re-conditioned S. S. America will be one of the very finest cabin ships in the world. First sailing is in March from New York to Plymouth, Cherbourg, and Bremen.

make it a point never to pay twice for the same piece of information."

Mr. Biechler insists that he did nothing spectacular in the shipping office of the machinery company. "I simply hustled every minute of the day and as long at night as it took me to finish up," he said. "There were a lot of odd jobs lying around that seemed to belong to nobody in particular. At first, I took them on to get them out of the way. But gradually there grew up in my heart a secret hope that somebody would notice how smart I was.

"Apparently nobody did! For eleven long months, I wrote tags and acquired new duties right and left, without receiving one word of comment, favorable or otherwise. Just before the year was up, I came to the conclusion that I had picked the wrong men to work for.

"'What's the use of keeping this hole as clean as a whistle, and doing three men's work?' I grumbled. 'Nobody except you knows a thing about it.'

"I was about ready to throw up my job when another thought occurred to me. 'Why,' I said to myself in some amazement, 'I'm getting enough satisfaction out of my performance to justify my efforts. It doesn't really matter if nobody else notices what I am doing.' And I promptly forgot all about the 'higher ups.'

"THEN one day came the proverbial bolt out of the blue. The 'Old Man' called me into his office.

"'Look here, young fellow,' he said, 'you write tags so fast that we've got to sell more machinery to keep you in a job. How would you like to go out on the road and do a little selling?'

"Gosh, but I was happy! I had never before had a chance to travel, and I was eager to try my hand at selling. The salary was all right too. With good luck, I would soon be making much more than I could possibly have earned as a lineman.

"But I honestly think that the thing that thrilled me most was the knowledge that somebody had been watching me after all. We are all human and most of us thrive on appreciation. I try to keep this fact in mind in dealing with my own men. Sometimes, however, the watchful eye of the man above is misinterpreted.

"Several years ago, one of my most promising men, a keen-eyed young chap in an important department, stopped me on one of my rounds and drew me off into a corner.

"'Mr. Biechler,' he said, 'I'm worried half to death. I don't know what's come over my chief, but he watches me all the time. I can't turn around that he isn't pussyfooting right behind me. He's got me so nervous I almost jump out of my skin every time I look up and catch him snooping about. I've got a wife and three kids, and I don't want to lose my job; but if he's going to fire me, for heaven's sake, tell him to go ahead and get it over with.'

"'If a man isn't worth watching, he isn't worth keeping, Bill,' I told him seriously. And then I added, 'Your chief has an eye on you, because he's stepping up in a couple of months, and you're to have his job!'

"I wish you could have seen the boy's face change!"

A year after young Biechler went on the road to sell machinery, he found himself purchasing agent for his firm. He was just twenty years old at this time.

At this point, the boy learned that the Chambers Company, of Philadelphia, old and well-established manufacturers of clay-working machinery, were on the lookout for a man to replace their Western representative, who had recently died. The Dayton firm was not expanding fast enough to satisfy the young purchasing agent. He decided to try to cast his lot with the Philadelphia company. Accordingly, he sent in his application setting forth in a businesslike and almost impersonal fashion his own qualifications as he saw them. A couple of letters were exchanged and Biechler was on his way to Philadelphia.

A few months later, fate stepped into the picture and immediately began to put crimps into the young man's plans for his new career. On one of his visits home, a friend asked him to deliver a message and a small parcel to a young woman who lived in a New Jersey town less than an hour out of Philadelphia.

The obliging Biechler delivered the message, and left his heart with it! A speedy courtship followed. A year or so later the young people were married. And, shortly after that, Mrs. Biechler made it known that she objected to a part-time husband. The joke of it was that in attempting to comply with his wife's wishes, Biechler jumped from the frying pan into the fire.

For some time, he had kept an interested eye on a struggling concern back in Dayton. This was the newly organized Delco company, which manufactured electric starters for automobiles. Biechler foresaw that the coming age was to be an electrical one, and he was eager to identify himself with it. One of the officers of the Delco company had been auditor for the Dayton clay-working machinery company when Biechler started working there. Biechler wrote him about a possible opening. Apparently this man had also watched the young shipping clerk, for he promptly wired for Biechler to come to Dayton and talk things over.

The upshot of the Dayton conference was that Biechler was invited to stay with the Delco people as traffic manager at considerably less than he was getting in Philadelphia. He jumped at the chance, because he believed that Delco was going to grow and grow fast. And he had sufficient confidence in himself to believe that he would grow with it!

At first, there was precious little traffic to manage. However, Biechler managed to keep busy until eleven or twelve o'clock nearly every night by following the precedent he had set for himself in his shipping-clerk days. He simply took unto himself any stray jobs in his vicinity not appropriated by anybody else.

IN THE beginning, the Delco Company (Dayton Engineering Laboratories Company) made only starting, lighting, and ignition systems. How they came to make farm-lighting systems is an interesting story.

One day a telegram came from a man in Florida:

Send me two Delcos by return express.

The records showed that this man, who apparently possessed only one car, already had a Delco. The Delco people were curious to know what in time he wanted with two more starters, so they put a service engineer on a train with the order. He came back with the news that the Florida man was planning to hitch the Delcos to a gas engine, to light his house.

"Good!" said the Dayton office. "We'll get busy and work out a more convenient scheme for lighting farm houses."

"It was a fascinating problem," Mr. Biechler told me. "Colonel Deeds and Mr. Kettering, at that time respectively president and vice president of Delco, had been brought up on farms, and they knew the hardships and handicaps that farm people had to contend with. Remember, it was only a few years ago," he reminded me, "that, in addition to her other heavy duties, the farm woman had to clean and fill her kerosene lamps daily. Running water was unheard of on the average farm. Nine out of ten farm women had to carry their supply from a spring, or draw it laboriously from a well or pump. In winter, this was a disagreeable and often a dangerous task. Many a case of pneumonia could be traced to a cold caught while filling the family water buckets.

"By a wonderful flash of the imagination, Colonel Deeds and Mr. Kettering saw farm life made easier and happier by the addition of conveniences for the women. The men-folks already had their reapers and binders, but little had been done for their wives."

The Delco laboratory and engineering experts were set to work. At the end of two years, the new lighting system was on the market, and so well did it go that in a couple more years a subsidiary known as the Delco-Light Company was formed. Young Biechler was promptly picked for the double job of traffic manager and purchasing agent for the infant organization. Evidently the "higher-ups" had been snooping again!

ABOUT this time, Delco was bought out, lock, stock, and barrel, by the General Motors Corporation. Shortly afterward Biechler was promoted to the position of sales manager. Five years later, he was made president and general manager of Delco-Light.

Meanwhile, the company had been developing a line of household appliances for the farm, including water systems, electrically operated washing machines, and so on. Now General Motors conceived the project of working out a product which would appeal especially to the city man and his wife.

The most important material thing in life is food, without which human beings cannot long exist. What piece of household equipment is most vitally related to food? Answer: The refrigerator. But there were already plenty of good refrigerators on the market. "But what about a refrigerator that would make its own ice supply?" somebody suggested.

It took several years to perfect a satisfactory electric refrigerator. And then began the always difficult job of persuading the public to take to a new-fangled idea. People flocked to see demonstrations of the electric refrigerator and said, "How wonderful!" and went right on using their old ice chests.

Something had to be done. The "higher-ups" looked around. Result:

More cars more days to use them more money to buy them

IMAGINE—today—along the highways right where you live, a sunswept ocean, orchard-covered hills and valleys, ancient Missions, the cathedral aisles of giant redwood groves thirty centuries old, Yosemite Valley—and you have a glimpse of what winter motoring is like in San Francisco and Central California!

For, in California, not only do we have plenty of automobiles—we use them all year 'round. Our five million people own 2,000,000 cars—more than one for every family in the state, and about twice as many, proportionately, as the average of other states.

Automobile ownership is only one of many indexes of this bed-rock, dollars-and-cents prosperity that you will find in San Francisco and all over California.

We pay twice as much income tax for our population as the national average. About twice as many of us have savings bank accounts, with an average deposit twice the average for the rest of America. To us, California has proved itself a land of doubled opportunity—for success as well as for the zest of living.

San Francisco

Start in at San Francisco, the industrial and Commercial capital of the Pacific Coast and the gateway to Hawaii, Australasia and the Orient. Go north or south through her rich trading area of fine cities and splendid farms—see how opportunity is written for anyone with reasonable capital and ability to get along!

Elmer G. Biechler was nominated to take on still another job. He started in as acting manager of the new electric refrigeration development. Six months later, he was appointed general manager. This was in the spring of 1924. Another two months, and he was elected president, but he was told that he would be expected to keep his job as general manager.

During the next twelve months, under the leadership of the new boss, the sales of refrigerators were doubled.

When Biechler took hold, the company was making two thousand refrigerators a year, and having a hard time to sell them. Today they are turning out 350,000 a year, and they are having a hard time to keep up with the demand!

I asked Mr. Biechler how he pulls this stunt of annually breaking his own record.

"I don't do it," he answered quickly. "The combined effort of fifteen thousand men pulling together does it! No matter how smart a man is, or how hard he works, he can't be a leader unless he can persuade others to follow him. There are two kinds of executive. One kind says, 'Go!' The other kind says, 'Come on, boys!' If I deserve any credit at all, it is because I have had the sense to treat my men in such a way that they pull with me, not against me. They know that if we fail, we fail together. And they know that when we win, the victory belongs to all of us."

"I BELIEVE in Luck," says Bruce Barton next month. "Luck played a big part in my own career, and I'm sure that every man in a big position knows in his own heart that forces entirely outside himself have played a large part in his making. But"—and note this well—"I also believe that breaks tend to happen to those who are prepared to receive them." This is just the type of article that sets you thinking about the part old Lady Luck has played in your own life. Are you ready for those breaks that are coming your way?

It used to be argued, and I regarded it as true, without much analysis, that of the home-town boys who had gone to the big city only one or two had found success, and all but four or five had returned to town, broken, discouraged men, their physique wrecked by the mad pace of the "terrible metropolis" and their spirit thoroughly destroyed.

As a matter of fact, this was far from the truth. The boys who had struck out for themselves in larger fields and who did very well for themselves greatly outnumbered the boys who came back; the trouble was that the boys who came back were around home where the home folks could always see them.

And, as I later discovered, most of the boys who had come back hadn't put up much of a struggle to remain away.

The home town, however, seemed only to remember about five natives who had left home and survived. One of them was a man who had worked in the wire mill and subsequently become a great power in the steel industry. Another was a boy who had worked in a local department store while going through college, met the Brady boys, and become a very rich man in Wall Street. A third was a young man who had come to own a stable of trotters operating on the Grand Circuit, and the fourth a man who had become world famous as a balloonist. A fifth had become a matinée idol. There's variety for you.

Never much at figures and always far from a handsome youth showing any histrionic talent, I was inclined to think that if I had been one of the five I would have become either the race-track man or the balloonist. New York, it seemed obvious, was not the place to try my luck in either field.

ONCE I thought of going to Boston, but a trip of inspection convinced me that its streets were too involved. Later I nearly hopped to Syracuse, which seemed to me at that time to come about as big as they made 'em.

Always, however, the still small voice advised, "You'll never stand a chance in a big place. You're too sensitive. You lack push. To make a living in a big town you've got to have a rhinoceros hide. Here at home, the people know you; they're all human beings and always ready to help you. In a big city, you'd be jumping in among a pack of wolves. A stranger hasn't one chance in a million!"

Never did I challenge the commonly expressed opinion that courtesy, fairness, honesty, and consideration were virtues exclusive to the small town.

I waited until I was nearly thirty before leaving the small town for the big, and I can truthfully say that, much as I love the old home town and happy as are its associations, its spirit compares with that of the big city as an Eskimo igloo in December compares with a telephone booth in July.

I've never had my pocket picked in New York; but once I had a fellow passenger on a subway put his wallet in my coat pocket by mistake when shifting his belongings.

I've never even seen a hold-up; none of my friends has been held up; but I've had people rush up and hand me money which no amount of argument could convince them I hadn't earned.

I've never encountered a drunken taxicab driver or a belligerent one who demanded any money except that registered on the meter.

I have yet to meet with anything except extreme courtesy and fairness in all channels in which my work takes me; and it has been my experience that the bigger the man the more courteous the reception.

Not until I came to the big city did I ever have any personal experience with such things as bonuses and Christmas gifts from the boss. And never until I reached it, did I have what always seemed to me to be the most incredible of experiences, a boss suggesting that I was working too hard and urging me to go on a vacation.

full pay with a substantial raise at its conclusion.

The big city hard-boiled! ! !

The big city cold and grasping! ! !

I never got a salary raise in a small town without fighting for it for months, if not for years, and my employers seemed to think "bonus" was Latin for ice water. The only thing I ever got from a small-town boss on Christmas was a 'phone call to get in early the following morning.

I was taught in the home town, by an employer for whom I worked most of my time, that one salary raise in three years was the height of liberality, and that an increase of three dollars a week was an item no boss could decide upon hastily, however prosperous. I never personally experienced or heard of a voluntary salary raise to any worker in the organization.

When one of the boys arrived at a point where he resolved to get more money, it was quite a trick to get it. The request had to go through many channels, although the boss had a desk in plain view. The reporter would ask his city editor for another dollar a week; the city editor would screw up courage enough to suggest such a thing to the managing editor; the managing editor, paling at the sign of revolt, would ultimately take the matter up with the business manager, and the business manager, suggesting that such a request revealed a marked decline in loyalty to the paper, would, after a month or two, convey the bad news to the publisher.

Looking backward, I think I never have seen such signs of acute suffering as would be shown by this employer at the prospect of the pay roll being hoisted another dollar. He would wince, sink into a chair, emit a noise strangely like a groan, shake his head slowly and then announce that the workers were in a wicked plot to cut down his earnings, undermine his morale and break down his health.

Invariably he would refuse the simoleon to the struggling slave, a little hint that there had just been an addition to the family leaving him cold and disinterested.

THERE is an historic case of one young man who, after pleading for a dollar raise for seven months, finally delivered an ultimatum that he was quitting.

"Where are you going?" asked the boss, who had summoned the youth to his office, hoping to argue him into remaining at the old price.

"Albany," replied the worker.

"How much have they offered you there?" asked the boss.

"Sixteen dollars a week."

"What are you getting here?" inquired the boss, trying to convey the idea he didn't bother with such details.

"Fifteen," was the reply.

The employer gazed at the floor for what seemed hours, and then, rising like a man who had made a great decision in a difficult matter of frenzied finance, exclaimed: "If that's the situation, that's the situation. I would have liked to have kept you with us."

This employer was not typical, perhaps, but in the small towns you will find many whose attitude approaches his. There was no justification for his pettiness. He had one of the most successful businesses in the state, was one of its richest men, and had an unusually efficient staff of workers.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

I don't think he realized he was miserly, or wanted to be. He had the viewpoint so often found in the smaller towns, that rigid economy is the greatest of virtues, and that no dollar should ever be surrendered without a battle. He was raised that way. So were the people who worked for him.

Great was my surprise when, after I had been in New York but a few months I was given an increase of thirty-five dollars a week, all in one lump. It didn't seem right. I think I expressed the thought that it wouldn't be playing fair by the corporation. I remember I was positive it couldn't last, and that as soon as it reached the eye of some presiding guardian over the cash drawer it would be lopped off and made something more reasonable, like a dollar and a half.

Then I got another raise of twenty dollars inside of six months. This unnerved me. I began to lose weight, jump at sudden noises and shiver at shadows. At the end of a year and a half my salary was one-hundred and seventy-five dollars a week, whereas the highest I had ever earned back home for doing three or four times as much work had been forty-five dollars.

I remember distinctly going about in a state of fear lest the building burn down.

ONE day the managing editor called me over by a ticker and floored me with this:

"You're not satisfied with what you're making here, are you?"

I tried to speak, but said nothing.

"You can make a lot more by syndication. Why don't you syndicate your stuff?"

"I-I-I-I'd like to-o-o," I stuttered.

"I've thought out a plan," he continued. "It'll double your money in no time. See me this afternoon; I'll give you the dope."

I managed to stammer my thanks. Then I reeled out into the corridor and gasped for air. A boss worrying because one of his men wasn't making enough money!

A managing editor going out of his way to help one of the staff gather extra cash!

"Quick, Watson, the smelling salts!"

This incident made me quite dizzy. I was certain there must be a "catch" in it. It couldn't be that employers ever gave salary raises without solicitation. It couldn't be that they actually mentioned the matter first. All my experience back home had been that a wage increase was something never mentioned by the boss, and only brought up by the worker as a last desperate gesture against the wolf at the door.

Of course, it may be that it has been my good fortune to come in contact in the big city with exceptionally liberal employers. I don't think so. Not one of them has been even remotely suspected of being careless with his money or too much endowed with sentiment.

It is an interesting fact that an employer upon whom I had looked for years with something akin to fear, as a result of a somewhat general impression that he was a cold business man and an inconsiderate boss, proved to be the most considerate and generous within my experience. This man was the late Frank A. Munsey, owner of the New York "Sun." I had been told that Mr. Munsey was a very difficult man to please, and that he was particularly censorious of "columns."

Never, however, did I receive a rebuke or a word of criticism from him from the day of my employment until the time of his death, and I met with two instances of thoughtfulness unique and unprecedented within my experience.

I had been on the paper for a month or two and assigned to share a small office with another worker. As this worker was a charming young lady it was far from a hardship. But Mr. Munsey happened in one morning and expressed surprise that I should lack an office of my own.

"You ought not to have to share an office," he said. "Wouldn't you like one all for yourself?"

"Why, yes," I managed to stammer, feeling quite floored by the solicitude.

"You shall have it," he declared, and in a few hours it was arranged.

The other instance of what to me was thoughtfulness above the usual came the day before the first Christmas I served on the paper. Mr. Keats Speed, the managing editor, called me into his office and handed me a substantial check.

"Mr. Munsey asked me to give this to you," he said.

"What for?"

"Just a little Christmas present, with his appreciation," said Mr. Speed.

Never had an employer given me a Christmas gift before, and the sensation left me somewhat groggy for hours.

Each subsequent Christmas a check from Mr. Munsey came through, and he stands in my memory as an ace of employers. His consideration seems the more unusual, in the light of the fact that I was never thrown into close contact with him, never saw him until the day I joined the "Sun," and never met him personally but once after that.

The big city chilly, marble-hearted, thoughtless!

Not that I have noticed!

WHEN I came to New York I thought that managing editors were so many Simon Legrees, cracking their whips, leaning from desk to desk, and bellowing hoarse orders to the cowering slaves of the typewriter. Back home in the smaller field, the title of managing editor had seemed to carry with it the obligation to grow a fierce black mustache, develop a deep voice, and pound the desk violently at five-minute intervals. I had become a managing editor there and a pretty hard-boiled one.

If small-town managing editors had to treat 'em rough, I reasoned, imagine what the big-town ones have to do! I regarded them with trembling and fear when I first hit the big burg; but I am yet to discover one with a bark. Without an exception all the managing editors I know are courteous, helpful, appreciative beings, who act very much like regular members of the human race. Probably that's why they're big-league managing editors.

If a criticism is to be made, a rebuke administered or an order given, they execute it quietly and kindly. In fact, while my impression of a managing editor's desk in a small town is that it is a bedlam, my impression of it in the big city is that it is almost a quiet zone.

A piece of unusual work generally brings a letter of appreciation from a metropolitan editor, and some of it is accompanied by a check. It was my experience in the small town that the boss took good work as something to be expected, and only lifted his voice, or his pen, when he wished to comment on bad work.

Back home a newspaper man was expected to be on call at all times of the day or night, work six days a week and Saturday night, be "docked" for a day off unless due to sickness, and get only one week's vacation a year on pay. It has been my experience in the big city that employers are thoughtful of their men, anxious to see that they are not overworked, and liberal in the matter of vacations.

Of course I may be wrong. My deductions may be due simply to the fact there are more people in the big town than the small one and, as a natural result, I've met more broad-minded folks. Perhaps as many warm hearts beat beneath the undershirts of a provincial town as beneath those of a metropolis. The more I think of this, the more logical it seems.

I'M NOT knocking the small town. I was born and raised in it. I had some of the best times of my life in it. I'd rather be born and raised in a small town than in a big city. I like to go back to my home town and meet old friends and talk over old associations.

My point is, that, so far as my own experience has shown, the widely accepted theory that the big city is hard-boiled in comparison with the small city is far from true. The "Watch Your Hat and Overcoat" and "Not Responsible for Valuables" signs do not reflect the spirit of the metropolis exclusively.

I never lost a hat or overcoat in a big city, but I have twice lost my entire wardrobe in towns of less than twenty thousand population. I have never even had my dog stolen in a metropolis; but I once had my automobile stolen in a small town, and I had my pockets picked at a country fair in a village of less than five thousand inhabitants.

The only place I was short-changed for any substantial sum was in a small-town hotel. And as for games of chance, the most wide-open gambling community I have ever seen is run each summer at a shore resort a few miles outside of my old home town. While the toughest taxicab driver I ever encountered was in a little city noted for its refinement. And the only incident wherein robbers entered into my life occurred in a suburb so small they hadn't named it yet.

Strange as it may seem, the only theft that ever disturbed me very much occurred in the deep woods on a fishing trip. There were four natives in the party and one of them got my thirty-five-dollar reel.

In the big city I have left a cashier's window without taking ten dollars change, and had the cashier run out and call me back for it; I have left valuable packages in subway trains and recovered them the next day at the lost and found department; I have lost my bankbook on the street, and had it returned inside of an hour. And once I lost a watch, advertised for it, and got over a quart basket full of them brought to the house from newspaper readers.

The big city, take it from me, is not so bad. It's merely been misrepresented.

2,500,000 Leonard Refrigerators

IN as many homes as there are in the whole of New York, Philadelphia and Detroit you'll find Leonard Refrigerators today. Every year more Leonards are sold than the combined output of the next two largest manufacturers.

We couldn't hold a record like that, year after year, if the Leonard wasn't more than just a good refrigerator. It is, in fact, a refrigerator achievement—built and tested by master craftsmen. Forty-six years of experience are behind the design and construction.

So, when the Leader, with its proven quality costs so little, of course you're going to get a Leonard. Remember to choose your cabinet first, whether you plan to use ice or mechanical refrigeration. The Leonard is built to use either, efficiently and economically, and you'll get Leonard refinements not obtainable in any other cabinet.

May we send you a book of styles? Address, Leonard Refrigerator Co., 303 Clyde Ave., Grand Rapids, Mich. (In Canada: Kelvinator of Canada, Limited, London, Ontario.)

These soft, delicious foods that cloy our palates and cheat our gums of work . . .

They give rise, dentists say, to this modern plague of "pink tooth brush"

"Party food," you'll grant is soft. But consider the things in your daily fare! They, too, lack the roughage that healthy gums require.

COOKING, once a plain and homely art, has changed. It has lost its old simplicity. Chefs have set the style, and our wives and hostesses have followed it. An abundance of delicious things to eat, daintily prepared and appetizingly served—these, modern taste demands, and gets.

But no-one who has studied the effect of our diet upon the tissues of the mouth can doubt that herein lies the reason of modern gum troubles. As your own dentist will readily testify, the profession traces the prevalence of gum disorders directly to the dining tables of the nation!

WHY MODERN FOODS MAKE TROUBLE FOR OUR GUMS

There's no mystery about it. The gum walls, like any other living tissue, need exercise. And in times gone by the vigorous chewing of coarse, fibrous foods kept gums active and constantly nourished by the brisk flow of fresh blood which this wholesome friction brought to the surface.

But these soft foods of today—these tender cuts of meat, these creamed vegetables, entrees, and fluffy puddings—they have no power to give to our gums the stimulation that they need to vitalize and sustain them.

Gradually enervated by a life of too much ease, gums grow lazy and flabby. They become tender—they bleed. All too often "pink tooth brush" gives its warning that more serious troubles may be close at hand.

Fortunately the dental profession offers a simple remedy for this difficulty—an easy, natural way to supply the stimulation so vital to the health of our gums. They recommend massage—a gentle frictionizing of the gum surfaces with the brush while brushing the teeth, or with the fingertips after each twice-daily brushing.

And thousands of dentists order their patients to use Ipana Tooth Paste for both the massage and the regular brushing. By its use you can more quickly rouse the laggard circulation of the gums to the healthful activity that offsets the damage done by a too civilized diet.

For Ipana contains ziratol, an antiseptic and hemostatic well known to the profession for its value in toning the gums and in strengthening weak, undernourished tissue. Ipana's power to promote gum health is one of the important reasons for the hearty professional support it has enjoyed from the day of its introduction.

The first time you use Ipana you will like its clean taste, its delicious flavor, and you will quickly see how much whiter and brighter it makes your teeth. The sample tube that the coupon brings—enough for ten days' use—will prove these things to you beyond a doubt.

THE FULL-SIZE TUBE MAKES THE BETTER TEST OF IPANA

But a fairer way to test Ipana is to get a regular tube at the drug store and use it faithfully, twice a day, for one full month. Then examine your gums. See how much healthier in color, how much firmer to the touch they have become. Then you may know that they are more soundly resistant to disease and infection than ever before—and that you have found the tooth paste you want to use for life!

The "Just-As-Soon-As" Habit

Butler?" as if I were some sort of game like "Button, button, who's got the button."

About once in a hundred times "just as soon as" is a legitimate excuse. The other times it is a side-step to put off doing something that should be tackled immediately with vim, vigor, and virility. I can understand that if a man is at the top of a flag pole, and busy gilding the ball up there, and his wife asks him to give her a five-dollar bill, he may be quite right in saying, "Yes, just as soon as I come down," because it is poor business to drop a five-dollar bill from the top of a flag pole, especially if there is a strong wind blowing.

But with some of us it works the other way. If an editor asks me to write something that will provide me with a five-dollar bill to give my wife, I am quite likely to say, "Yes; just as soon as I climb up a flag pole and gild the ball at its top." And when someone says to me, "Well, why don't you climb?" I usually say, "I will just as soon as I get five dollars to buy some overalls."

I still hope to write my seventy-six novels, but I am not so hopeful about it as I once was. One novel every fifty-eight years is not a speed record, and Methuselah himself lived only nine hundred and sixty-nine years.

PEOPLE are constantly saying, "Just as soon as I can sell this house and go to the country to live, my life will be one grand sweet song. Away from the noise of the street cars and automobile horns I'll get things done. Yes, sir." And the folks in the rural districts say, "Just as soon as I can get away from the racket of these infernal birds and crickets and crowing roosters—and get the real stimulation of the city's rush and bustle, I'll show the world what's in me!"

Many a man has said, "Just as soon as it stops raining I'll feel better, and jump on this job with both feet," and when it stops raining he goes out and plays a game of golf. "Too fine to stay indoors," he says; "I'll knock that job silly just as soon as the marvelous weather changes." So that job does not get done, and he makes a 122 for eighteen holes, and says, "I'll break 100 just as soon as that wooden-headed Green Committee gets the fairways in decent shape."

Personally speaking, no Green Committee has ever got a fairway in shape to suit my style of golf; my idea of a satisfactory fairway is one made of tin, in trough shape, with one end of the trough where I start the ball rolling and the other end where the ball will fall into the hole. The golf courses of America are all dotted up with golfers who really are going to enjoy the game just as soon as they break 80 or break 90 or break 100, or break in a new pair of shoes.

The minute a magazine editor hears an author say, "Just as soon as—" his face loses its usual beatific expression. He has heard that phrase—or read it in letters from authors—hundreds of thousands of times. He writes to an author and takes him out to lunch—all the good lunches I have had in the past twenty years are lunches I have been taken out to by editors—and over the gold-plated partridge or diamond-studded baked beans, he will propose the subject for an article he wants the author to write.

"It's a thing you can do a fine job on," he says. "We'll get Orlando J. Tenderbeck to do some of his bully illustrations for it. It's a subject everyone will be interested in—clothes."

"Great!" says the author enthusiastically. "Everybody wears them."

"But all the articles about clothes have so far been too solemn. Clothes are not always solemn; take that suit of yours, for example— Well, never mind! but I don't call that a solemn suit. So that's what we want, an article about clothes, but treated in a light way."

"Fine!" exclaims the author. "Great! How about calling it, 'Clothes I Have Known, Including Coat, Vest and Two Pairs of Pants?'"

"Wonderful!" cries the editor.

"Hot stuff!" shouts the author, and they embrace.

Then the editor says, "When can you do it?"

"Well," says the author, "I'll do it just as soon as I get back from California, and I'm starting for there just as soon as my wife gets back from Asia."

"When do you expect her back?" the editor asks, his face falling so that it hides his necktie.

"She's going to start home just as soon as the war over there starts or ends or something."

It is this sort of just-as-sooning that causes the hair of editors to turn from the glossy black of youth to the white of untrodden snow in a few months' time, that furrows their brows with care until they resemble plowed upland, and that drives them to hurl authors into the sea in such numbers that, falling, they sound like buckshot poured into a tin wash basin.

It is the same sort of just-as-sooning that makes many a boss gnaw the varnish off the edge of his desk in grim agony of despair. He knows only too well the salesman who sings the tune, "Just as soon as I get a better territory the boss will have to enlarge the factory."

THEN there is the man who is always just-as-sooning about the New Year. After January 1, he is going to be a little white angel with spotless wing feathers and an electrically illuminated halo. And the man who is going to diet just as soon as the Egregious Order of Fatted Calves has pulled its Annual Banquet. And the man who is going to buckle down to work as never before, just as soon as he gets back from this vacation. And the lady who is going to stop being extravagant, just as soon as she buys this one lot of clothes, including hat, shoes, inner-and outer-wear, a fur coat, thirty-six pairs of stockings, and a handkerchief. And the man who is going to quit playing poker just as soon as he breaks even.

I know what is back of my own just-as-

"I thought my dog had gone mad"

"The first time my dog had a fit, I thought he was mad. I might have shot him if a neighbor hadn't told me it was probably caused by worms. Sergeant's Sure Shot Capsules stopped them in a hurry."

In almost all cases, fits are due to improper care and feeding. Many a valuable dog has been shot for mad because the owner did not know the difference between fits and rabies. Use Sergeant's Sure Shot Capsules and Condition Pills.

Symptoms
Animal clamps jaws and froths at the mouth. Muscles jerk and throw body to the ground with legs moving rapidly. Dog rises and is stupid.

Do You Know?

Would you know whether your dog had fits or rabies? Would you know what to do in either case? Do you know how to prevent these ailments? It costs nothing for you to find out these worthwhile facts. There are effective remedies for fits and all other dog diseases and it is a simple matter to know when and how to use them.

DON'TS for Dog Owners
Don't feed your dog sweets or pastry. Don't feed potatoes to a puppy.

Last Year's Pay Looks Like Small Change To These Men Today!

Former Cowpuncher
William Shore, Neenach, Cal., writes he made over $3000 first 5 months after N. S. T. A. Training, and now earns as much as $525 in a single week.

Former Factory Man
R. B. Hansen, Akron, O., used to make $160 a month. Now says his income exceeds $10,000 a year, thanks to N. S. T. A. Training.

Former Farmer
L. O. Halloman, Slaton, Tex., was eking out a bare existence. He took advantage of N. S. T. A. Training and Employment. Now reports making $700 a month!

Former Clerk
F. J. Walsh, Springfield, Mass., was earning $1000 a year when he read "Modern Salesmanship." Now tells us his earnings exceed $7000 annually!

HERE are four men who were formerly caught in the hopeless treadmill of low-pay jobs. Today every one of them reports earnings ranging up to $10,000 a year! An amazing book called "Modern Salesmanship" fell into their hands, and they suddenly learned that the big salaries they had often wished for were actually within their reach—that they could quickly become masters of the highest-paid profession in the world! Within a short time every one of them had increased his income more than 100%—and now their total average increase since they discovered salesmanship is more than 500%!

Where Shall We Send Your Copy of "Modern Salesmanship"—FREE?

If these men were exceptions, their phenomenal rise might be attributed to luck. But it can hardly be an accident when man after man is able to raise his pay through the same simple, easy method. Let "Modern Salesmanship" tell you how you can qualify in a few short weeks for a city or traveling sales position that should pay you more in a week than the average routine job pays in a month. Learn about the Free Employment Service open to N. S. T. A. members, which last year received calls for over 50,000 men from leading manufacturers, jobbers, and wholesalers. The book, "Modern Salesmanship" contains a message of vital importance to any man who wants to lift himself above the level of mediocrity—who hungers for the good things of life that real success brings. soon-as habits. It is plain everyday reluctance to jump right in and tackle a job that may mean some real work. It is an anything-for-an-excuse method of putting a job off a little longer. I began young, which is the best way to get a habit. "Ellis," Mother would call, "come down to breakfast!" "Yes'm; just as soon as I get my stockings on." And then I would sit on the bed with my chin on my knees and say, "I'll put on my stockings just as soon as she calls me again," and when she called me again I would answer, "Yes'm; just as soon as I put on my shoes."

That's a fine way in which to acquire a splendid case of pernicious anemia of the will; and presently a man becomes so floppy that he lies down and lets the other fellows walk on him as they go rushing by to grab the bacon, and all he says is, "I'll get up from here just as soon as the crowd gets off my face." By that time people are saying, "It's no use to ask Bill to do it; he always has something he has to do first."

EVEN dogs get the habit. We have a dog now that is a long, low dog with an architecture resembling a one-story bowling alley, but fuzzy, and a composite style ancestry. We call him Lucky, because he is lucky he has only four legs—if he had a few more legs he would have been a caterpillar.

The former owner of Lucky must have been one of the men who say, "I am going to quit smoking just as soon as I finish this box of cigars," or a lady who said, "I am going to invite the Bunburys to lunch just as soon as I have my face lifted," because he has the just-as-sooning habit in a virulent form. He is a brisk and sprightly dog; but if you say, "Lucky! Get your ball! Find your ball!" he sits down instantly and lifts his foot, signifying, "Yes, just as soon as I get this flea scratched." Then someone says sternly, "Lucky! Get that ball!" and to all intents and purposes that dog says, "Yes; but there is another flea over here in Lot 7, Block 65, that I haven't scratched yet; just as soon as I scratch this one I'll get the ball." Then we lose patience, and say in no gentle tone, "Lucky! Go and get that ball this instant!" But by that time he is so tired from scratching that he says, "Just as soon as I take a little nap," and he goes out in the back hall and sleeps for hours—unless someone steps on him.

This sort of thing is ruinous to a dog's morale, and it is hard on the family because, in the end, if we want to have the dog play with the ball, we have to get the ball ourselves; and the ball is usually under the radio cabinet, and that means going to the kitchen to get the broom, and when I get to the kitchen I decide to have a few cheese sandwiches.

That is how things get into a deadlock. Many a boss has said, "I'll give Jones a raise just as soon as he shows a little more life;" while Jones is saying, "I'll show a little more life just as soon as the boss gives me a raise."

Christopher Columbus did not say; "Just as soon as I can figure out how to make an egg stand on end I'll discover America." He grabbed the egg, and whacked it on the table, and leaped aboard the "Nina," the "Pinta" and the "Santa Maria," and look at America to-day—fifty-story buildings, bathtubs, hot and cold water, and all the modern improvements! If Noah had said: "I'll build an ark just as soon as this shower is over," we would never have heard of Noah at all, and the animals would never have gone into the ark two by two, and we would probably be getting our milk from milkweed instead of from contented cows.

Washington did not say; "I'll win a free America just as soon as I get this cherry tree chopped down." He got rid of the cherry tree bright and early and had it off his hands. Neither did John D. Rockefeller say, "I will get into the oil business just as soon as the automobile creates a brisk demand for gasolene." He was in the business when the automobile appeared. The men who get there are the "Aye! Aye!" men; they have a lot of "Do it now" in their make-up.

Sturdy old Joshua had the right spirit back in Bible days. When he was handed the job of licking the Amorites he saw it was no ordinary eight-hour job, or even a twelve-hour job that he had to tackle. But Joshua did not say, "All right! I'll get at it just as soon as the days get longer." Not Joshua! No, sir! "Sun, stand still!" he said, and the sun and moon stood still until the job of trimming the Amorites was finished in a neat and tasty manner. That was the first and best job of daylight saving on record.

Cincinnatus, you will remember, leaped from the plow without an "if" or an "and," and saved Rome, and he defeated the Æquians and was back at his plow again in sixteen days. And although that happened over two thousand years ago, his name is still spelled correctly by every school child in Cincinnati, Ohio. If he had said, "I'll come just as soon as I get my spring plowing done," the Roman army would have been looking like thirty sesterces. Young Lochinvar, to mention another scrapper, leaped on his horse and swam the Esk River, where ford there was none. If he had said, "I'll come just as soon as they get the bridge built," the fair Ellen would have been Mrs. Netherby. Lochinvar got the girl. Josh Billings did not write, "I will becum a yumerist just as sune as I lern to spel," but jumped right in and was one.

NO ONE has yet discovered a better way of getting a thing done than the simple one of doing it. Will Irwin, when he came back from the Mississippi River Flood region, told me that, however great the confusion was, there was order again within a few hours after Herbert Hoover appeared. In Washington, Hoover had a hundred important matters on hand when he was sent for. I probably would have wired, "I'll come just as soon as I can hire a substitute," but Hoover went. Will Irwin himself, busy as he always is, went as soon as Hoover wired to him. The man who does no just-as-sooning himself is the man who always has at his command other men who tackle their jobs promptly and effectively. During the war, "Hoover's men" were famous for their celerity and success.

You can bet that Napoleon never met the news that Austrians had worked their army into a precarious position with the words, "I'll attend to them just as soon as I have walloped the Italians." He jumped over and eliminated the Aus-

PROOF!

Our files are crammed with letters like these, which prove that the hotel industry is the field of big opportunity today.

Elwood V. Matlack, Jr.—"Less than two years ago I was an elevator boy. Now I am Manager of Hotel Homer, Akron, Ohio. I give Lewis Training the credit for my success."

Mrs. C. H. Mahle—"I am Manager of La Vale Inn, Cumberland, Md. Words cannot express the worth of Lewis Training to me."

Earnest Crowder—"The Lewis Schools are entirely responsible for my appointment as Assistant Manager of Hotel English, Indianapolis, Ind."

Mrs. Louise Rayner—"I have full charge of the linen room at Hotel Walt Whitman, Camden, N. J. Words cannot tell how much Lewis Training benefited me."

FREE BOOK Gives Full Details

There are opportunities for you in this big paying hotel industry. Many students have obtained hotel positions paying as high as $2,500 a year, even before they had finished the course. My Free Book "Your Big Opportunity" shows you how you can do as well.

The coupon above will bring you by return mail this vitally interesting, illustrated book, which shows how YOU can become a high-salaried hotel executive; also tells how our students are winning success with Lewis Training, and explains about our National Employment Bureau, and our Money-Back Agreement.

trians, and then jumped back and made the Italians see stars, before they knew he was anywhere at all. It was not until Napoleon began saying, "I'll whip the world just as soon as I have divorced Josephine," that he began to head for St. Helena.

Eugene Field tells a story of a young man who subscribed for an encyclopedia in many volumes; but because of the lawsuit that pestered the old Ninth Edition, the delivery of the volumes was awfully delayed. The volumes came along one at a time, one, one year and the next five or six years later. The young fellow grew from youth to manhood, a volume coming now and then. He married, and another volume came, and about the time his third or fifth child was born, he'd received a few more. By the time he was sixty he had just reached Vol. MEM-MYZ, and his only ambition was to hang on to life until he had received and paid for Vol. YUK-ZYM; then he would die happy. So the years went on, and he became an old, old man, all crippled up with rheumatism and full of pains, and bedridden. One day, as he lay in bed looking at the vacant place next to Vol. TOR-YUJ, he saw the encyclopedia agent come driving up the lane. All he wanted was to get that last volume and pay for it and die, and be out of his misery.

His children and his grandchildren propped him up with pillows, and when the agent entered the room, the poor old man took Vol. YUK-ZYM in his arms and gave the agent the money for it, and got ready to drop back and die.

"One minute!" said the agent. "I just want to say that I probably won't see you next year; but I'll be here in a few years with the next volume."

"The next volume?" the old man asked with quivering lips.

"Yes, the Index," said the agent, and I don't remember what the poor old man did then.

I HAVE a house out here on Long Island that is probably the most just-as-sooned structure in the world, now that the Washington Monument is completed. For many long years that incomplete shaft in the nation's capital came mighty near leading to this country being renamed the Just-as-soon States of America. My house is a rather noble-looking mansion of the 1870 period which, in architectural circles, is known as the Punk or O Gosh period. It has a high mansard forehead, with windows in it in the style known as the Flushing-French style, planned to let in the cold in winter and keep in the heat in summer. The plan was a success.

I bought this house with the money "Pigs is Pigs" made for me, and I had quite a little trouble thinking up an appropriate name for it. "Pig Pen" did not seem quite a nice name for a gentleman's estate, and I hesitated between that and "The Butler's Pantry," for quite a while. I gave up the latter name because I was afraid people would think it was a place to bring pants to be pressed, and now I call it "Just-as-soon Villa." I call it a villa because it is in such a villainous condition.

For fifteen or twenty years I have been intending to begin a brisk social career by inviting some of my New York friends out from town for a week-end visit, just as soon as I got the guest-room ceiling repapered; but there was no use having that ceiling repapered until I could have all the ceilings repapered, and I have been meaning to have that done just as soon as I had the roof repaired. The roof leaks in spots, and there are so many spots it reminds me of a leopard. That is because there is so much tin roof.

I am going to have the roof mended just as soon as I have a carpenter mend the eaves and jack up the front porch. There is no sense in having new tin put on eaves that are dropping into the spirea bushes in chunks.

So I am going to send for a carpenter just as soon as I can afford to have him do a complete job and put in new floors and another bathroom, and make one job of the whole thing. That's why the house is not painted. There's no use in having a house painted, and then having a carpenter come and stick new unpainted eaves all over it. So I am going to have the house painted just as soon as the new heating plant is in. Nobody but an idiot would put in new floors and then have them torn up again immediately to accommodate steam pipes. If I have steam pipes, that is. I can decide that just as soon as I get some accurate figures on the comparative advantages of hot air, water, and steam.

Anyway, how do I know what the next owner of the house will want in the way of a heating plant? And, of course, I am going to sell the house just as soon as the subway trains are running to Flushing. And I am reliably informed that the subway trains will be running just as soon as the place where the piles sunk into Flushing Meadow is fixed. So I expect to invite my friends to week-end with me just as soon as the break in the subway is mended. The only trouble is that then I won't have any house.

WHEN we plead that we will do a thing "just as soon as," old Human Nature is getting her dirty work in. The hard job requires alertness of mind or tenseness of application or extra exertion of muscles, and that means we must be wider awake. Some great philosopher—I'll look up his name just as soon as I have time—has said that all human greatness is a battle against inertia, or words to that effect.

The men who never spur their minds or their muscles to unusual exertion are in a sort of comatose condition all their lives, and it is comfortable to drowse along in that way, soothing one's conscience by saying from time to time, "I'll get busy and do the big thing just as soon as to-morrow comes," or, "just as soon as I get a big steam-heated office." The man who gets there with the bells on is the man who says, "I will do this job right here and now."

I find some sorts of work easier to do than other sorts. All of us do. Often the harder work is the more important; but we put it off and drug our consciences by saying, "I'll get at it just as soon as I have cleared my desk," or whatever our pet lazy job is.

In some respects I admire the citizens of the republic to our south, who say frankly "To-morrow." They don't get much done, because "to-morrow" never comes, but they don't hide behind a false

An Easier Way to Make Money!

What chance has the wage-earner?

"A mighty good one," says Ralph H. Berndt—but read his story . . .

Berndt had had only an elementary education. He was assistant roller at the Carnegie Steel Mills, Youngstown, Ohio.

"Realizing that hands and feet would not do for me any longer," he writes, "I decided to give my brain a business training." Today, thanks to Higher Accountancy training with LaSalle, he is Auditor for W. C. DuComb Co., Inc., Detroit—with easier hours, work that he likes, and a larger income. "LaSalle," he adds, "has been the instrument to my success."

claim of being busy. Their "mañana" is not an excuse but a national custom. An out-and-out loafer deserves a great deal of respect, if he can get it; but a philosopher might see in our widespread just-as-sooning the beginning of national deterioration in a people that has reasonably claimed to be the world's star hustlers. I can't see that myself; so many people are hustling that I usually feel like a turtle on a baby-car in the middle of an automobile speedway, wondering when I am going to be knocked into the week after next by the mile-a-minute boys. But success is a long-legged rabbit, and it has to be chased if you want to catch it; and the only way to chase it is to go after it on the jump. Fido may be a good dog, and hold seventeen bench-show blue ribbons; but one thing is sure: if, when he sees bunny flash by like a streak of greased fur, he sits down and bends himself into a circle, and says, "Just as soon as I scratch a few fleas I will get that rabbit," one dog is going to dine on dog biscuit and not on rabbit. Just-as-soon-as gets no game.

COLONEL BRAXTON returns next month! He has been away for some time, no doubt solving legal mysteries, righting wrongs, fighting for justice, sheltering the weak. He is a great fiction character, this whimsical, profound Virginia lawyer of the old school—one of the greatest MELVILLE DAVISSON POST has created. "Colonel Braxton Chooses a Client" is the title of the story you will enjoy next month. In this fine tale the Colonel plays the rôle of guardian to the fatherless.

his question. He mustn't know, and yet how could she keep it from him?

Little Jim came running down the stairs.

"Well, old man!" His father smiled at the boy and the boy smiled back.

"We made a cave this morning."

"Oh, did you? Fine!"

Again she was forgotten, outside.

"Everybody all ready for dinner?" she put in, trying to make her voice gay. Then her smile faded: "Jim, you didn't wash your face!"

Little Jim wriggled. "It doesn't need it. It'll just get dirty again. My mother never makes me—"

The room seemed to swim before Beth's eyes. She wanted to grab that little figure and shake it! She didn't care if he was Jim's son, she hated him! And she couldn't stand it!

Without a word, she turned and went out into the dining-room.

Big Jim followed her. "Why, honey, what's the matter?"

She turned to him, deadly white, deadly serious, "There, you see! He disobeys me and glories in it! He does it on purpose—he—"

"But, Beth, that's just a little thing," said Big Jim.

"Yes, just a little thing, but it's one of a pile! And I tell you, Jim McLaughlin, I won't sit down to dinner with your son unless he washes his face!"

Dinner was a very subdued, uncomfortable meal. Little Jim appeared with his face washed, and ate silently, his eyes wandering every once in a while to Beth's face. Big Jim, too, kept looking at Beth. She avoided his eyes, she could not bear the question in them; but she was the only one who talked. Calmly, collectedly, she maintained impersonal conversation until the meal was over, the dishes were washed, and the two Jims had gone up-stairs.

Then she collapsed in a chair in the living-room. From up-stairs came those two voices, the boy's and the man's, Jim and Jim's son. What was going to happen? They could not keep on like this, yet what was there to do? That little boy was her husband's son, and this was his home. The future loomed up before her, days and days, she and little Jim always in conflict, his mother rising like a wall between them, urging him against her—that woman who had been her husband's wife; and big Jim, miserable, not understanding, blaming her, his love gradually dying away.... She covered her face with her hands to shut out the picture.

The next minute, big Jim had gathered her into his arms.

"NOW," he said, smiling tenderly upon her, "what's up? The kid, I know, didn't mind well to-day. He told me about it. He says he's sorry."

"Oh, it isn't that," she cried. "It isn't just to-day, it's everything!" Then, suddenly sitting up, tense, her hands clenched, "I hate her! I never hated anyone so in my life! And I hate him too—for coming between us! That's what they've done, the both of them—come between us, breaking up our life, spoiling our marriage, our wonderful marriage."

"Here, here!" put in big Jim. "What's this? Spoiling our marriage?"

"Oh, I know it's my fault," she went on; "you needn't tell me so. I know it is. I should have made him love me. I shouldn't have minded about her; and I should have been a real mother. I tried hard; yes, I did try hard! But it's been too much, that's all. I can't. And what's going to become of me now?" She was crying now, deep, racking sobs. "Oh, people shouldn't get married young unless they're sure; it was wrong, wrong to little Jim and to me! Oh, why couldn't you have waited? Now, it's spoiled our whole life—"

"Spoiled?" Jim interrupted her almost harshly. "What are you talking about? Nothing's spoiled. If you feel that way about the kid, he'll have to go away, that's all."

"Away?" she repeated; "but where?"

"We'll send him to school, and later she will be back."

"Away to school?" She sat very still.

"Yes, dear, and you and I will be here, all alone, just as we used to be."

"But we oughtn't to do that, Jim. This is his home. You're his father. He belongs here."

"I sha'n't have him here if it troubles you. I had hoped"—he gave a little sigh—"I had hoped that things would work out differently; but so long as they haven't . . . I'm not going to have you unhappy." He held her closer. "Don't you know—you're everything to me, Beth? I never knew life could be so wonderful—these last three years."

Gradually her sobs died away. His words slipped comfortingly into her heart. And yet, though he placed her first in all the world, there still lingered an ache, the ache of having dashed his hopes, of having failed him.

There was a long silence. She sat very still, his arms around her, her head upon his shoulder.

"It's lucky," she whispered, "that we didn't have children of our own. I'm afraid I wouldn't have been a good mother."

"But, darling!" His voice was agonized.

"But then, there's one thing," she went on, "with your own children, you grow with them. Oh, Jim! I'm so sorry . . . I wish . . . if only . . . let's try again. Perhaps I could get along—"

He shook his head. "No. It's settled. He goes."

But there were times during the next two weeks when she questioned the decision. When little Jim came hurrying in for lunch, excited, flushed, appealing; when one Sunday afternoon big Jim took him to the hill on the next street to try his new sled. As she watched those two figures trudging off together, father and son, she wondered. . . . Big Jim loved her now, he was willing to give up his son for her; and yet, in the years to come, how would he feel, looking back and knowing that she had kept him from his boy; that she had sent his son away from home?

And after little Jim was gone, could they settle back into the old life together, knowing what they knew? Wouldn't the shadow of little Jim rise between them? She was afraid. Yet they could not keep on like this. She was no closer to the boy than when he had come. In fact, she seemed further away. Then she had been a stranger, now she was an enemy—that look in his eyes!

LITTLE Jim himself took the news that he was going quite calmly. And Beth remembered what big Jim had said: "He's used to knocking around, going different places," and her heart smote her—eight years old!

"Well, son," big Jim had said jovially across the dinner table, "what do you say to going away to school the rest of the year?"

Little Jim laid down his fork.

Beth waited breathlessly for his answer.

For a moment, a frown puckered his forehead. "Not the school at Lanning?" he said.

"School at Lanning?" repeated big Jim.

"My mother sent me there one winter. I was just a little kid then, but I . . . didn't like it much."

"No," big Jim hastened to add, "not that school, another one. We haven't quite decided what school it will be; but there'll be lots of boys there to play with, and basketball, and baseball in the spring and—"

Little Jim seemed to be quite pleased with the idea.

"I'm going away to school," Beth overheard him bragging to his friends.

She also overheard him say to his father, "Will I come back here in the summer, or my mother—will she be coming home?" And again Beth's heart smote her.

She and Jim painstakingly read catalogues, consulted friends, and Jim took a day off and inspected a school in Connecticut. He came back, very enthusiastic.

"Just the place for him. Quite a few younger boys, and a real motherly woman too, the wife of the principal, and not so far that we can't see him occasionally," he reported to Beth. To little Jim he enlarged on the big grounds, and the hills for coasting, and the fields to play in in the spring.

Beth went shopping with little Jim for a new suit, shoes, underwear. And in the evening, when the clothes came, little Jim displayed them with pride to his father.

"He's glad to go," thought Beth. "He doesn't mind leaving us. Children are that way—something new."

IT HAPPENED that the day before he was to go, big Jim was called out of town on business.

"But I'll be back to-morrow morning, honey, without fail," he told worried Beth. "You bring the kid in, and I'll meet you at the Grand Central in time for the ten-o'clock train."

That evening Beth and little Jim had dinner together for the first time alone. At first, the boy was very talkative, full of questions. But toward the end of the meal he became very silent.

"These are good cookies," he remarked. "Do you suppose we'll have cookies at school?"

"Oh, yes, I'm sure," Beth hastened to say.

"But I don't believe they'll be as good as these," he said.

And suddenly Beth could have kissed him.

After he was undressed, she went into his room to open the window and turn off the light, as his father usually did.

He looked very small in the bed, his dark head against the pillow.

"Aren't you going to sit down and talk?" he asked, a little wistfully, as she moved toward the window. "My father always does."

Quickly she went over to the bed and sat down. Silently they regarded each other.

"I think you'll like school, Jim," she said.

"Yes, I guess I will," he answered. "But I won't have a room like this, will I, all to myself? This is a nice room," his glance wandered appreciatively around. "I never really had a room like this before. Of course, in the apartment I had one; but it was so small, and then at Grandma's and the hotels; but they weren't any of them as nice as this. It's a nice house too. We never had a house. Do you suppose there'll be apples on the trees next fall? I'll be here then, won't I?"

"Yes, you'll be here then," she said, a little catch in her voice.

Silence. Presently she rose.

"I guess you'd better go to sleep now. Good night."

"Good night."

She leaned over and kissed him quickly, and for a moment it seemed to her almost as if his arms clung to her. Then she went to open the window. The cold night air came rushing in. Quickly she snapped off the light.

"It's nice to have somebody open the window when it's cold," came the small voice from the bed. "I usually have had that ill health and malnutrition commonly called "run-down condition"

When cachexia, as frequently happens, is due entirely to the absence of a certain vital dietary factor, yeast is the food to eat. In all such cases, yeast quickens the appetite, improves the digestion and enables you to get strength, energy and endurance from the food you eat. Like the spark for the gasoline in your motor.

Yeast is far-famed as a tonic, regulator and general conditioner. And now, in Yeast Foam Tablets, you can get yeast in a form you'll like. Easy to swallow, pleasant to chew like candy. Try them just once, and you'll see.

If I were a motorist

I'd be primed for changing tires along dark country roads, ready to pick out road-signs at dark intersections, ready for all those jobs that come to the man who drives a car at night.

Not only ready, but Eveready, if you get me, with a good flashlight. And I'd keep that flashlight hitting on all cylinders by using genuine Eveready Batteries — the kind that lasts and lasts and lasts.

Get the flashlight habit. That's my tip to motorists, and no foolin'.

to do it myself. Of course, my mother," he rallied loyally, "would have done it if she'd been there; but she usually wasn't."

Beth went out, closed the door, went down-stairs and tried to read. But she couldn't. Little Jim and his mother kept rising before her. It was the first time she had had an intimation that that mother was not perfect; and the picture of that little figure opening the window, getting into bed all by himself, while his mother danced—she remembered how he had boasted of his mother's dancing—wrung her heart. And now she was sending him away from his "nice room."

She banged the book closed, went up to her room and started to undress. How quiet the house was! And more quiet tomorrow without little Jim! Again she questioned their decision. He was Jim's son. Perhaps, if she had tried harder to get close to him, if she hadn't been ready to be hurt, if she hadn't brooded about his mother, and let that wall rise between them—again she felt the pressure of his arms around her neck.

Suddenly she began to cry.

"BETH, what's the matter?"

She looked up startled. Little Jim stood in the door in his pajamas.

"Why, Jim! Aren't you asleep?"

"No; I woke up." He came forward blinking into the light. "What's the matter?"

"I—I don't feel well," she lied.

He studied her face.

"I'll get you a hot-water bag," he said. "That'll help the pain."

She heard him in the bathroom running the water. He came back a few moments later with a bulging bag, and gravely presented it to her, as if in his father's absence he was the man of the house, pledged to look after his women-folk.

"There," he said proudly; "you'll feel better. If you don't, call me."

He walked out of the room, leaving Beth uncertain whether to laugh or to cry.

They were both up early the next morning.

Beth moved around the kitchen getting breakfast as if in a dream. It didn't seem possible that little Jim was really going, she thought, as she squeezed his orange juice. No orange juice to squeeze tomorrow morning. Recklessly she put more sugar than usual in his cocoa—he liked sweet things—and she made him some French toast. He liked that too.

He ate it with relish.

"Gee, this is good! Do you think we'll have breakfasts like this at school?"

"Yes, yes," she assured him, though in her heart she was doubtful.

He helped her do the dishes, and as usual had to be admonished to wipe them dry. Then they packed his bag, his new bag. Gravely, together they went over the contents: comb, tooth brush, pajamas. But they were both very quiet, and somehow Beth could not meet his eyes.

Then into her town dress, her coat and hat; on with Jim's new overcoat; down-cellar for a last look at the furnace.

When she came up, little Jim was standing in the hall, his bag beside him, twisting his hat. Somehow he looked very small, very young.

"Did you fix the furnace?" he said. "That's a good furnace, isn't it? It works well."

The sun was streaming through the windows of the living-room, shedding its radiance on her lovely soft-colored rugs, on her pretty furniture. Little Jim's eyes roved around, then haltingly they came to rest on her.

"This is a nice house." His voice died away in a little sigh.

Beth had already picked up the bag. With it in one hand, the other hand on the door knob, she turned to him suddenly:

"Jim, don't you want to go?"

He raised worried eyes to hers.

"Well . . . I . . . I'd rather stay here." Then, hurriedly, "I suppose it would be a nice school; but I didn't like that one I was sent to before, the one my other mother sent me to."

His other mother! Those words echoed through Beth's mind. She stood there, staring at him. And suddenly the scales dropped from her eyes, and she saw. His other mother was not the perfect being he had tried to make her out. She had neglected him, shunted him off on her parents, dragged him around to hotels. But she was the one stable person in his life, and, childlike, he was proud of her, had clung to her, and when he had come into this well-ordered home, he had bragged of her, the one thing in life that was his.

"My mother, my mother." It was his defense, his armor; but, underneath—Perhaps he had been anxious for Beth's affection, her interest, and she had pushed him off, had let the wall of sensitiveness rise between them. And now she was sending him away from the only home he had ever known. She was shunting him off, too, upon others. . . .

Her eyes met his, and suddenly for the first time she caught a look of Jim.

Quickly she set down the bag.

"Then you sha'n't go!"

"Not go?" he cried. "But, Father—he said—I thought you wanted me to!"

For a moment they stood there eying each other.

"If you don't want to go, you sha'n't," she repeated. "Don't worry about your father. He doesn't want you to go, and neither do I." She tried to laugh, but there was a sob in her voice. "So we are all agreed. See?"

THEY met big Jim near the information booth in the station. He was walking up and down, anxiously waiting. When he saw them, his face lighted up; then a question leaped into his eyes.

"Why, what's the matter? Jim's bag—where is it?"

"It's home," she answered briefly. "Will you please wire Mr. Masters right away? Jim isn't going."

"Not going?" Big Jim's glance went from one to the other.

"I never said I didn't want to," cried little Jim, "until she asked me. Honestly! I didn't kick, I was a good sport—just as you said!"

It was Beth's turn to look from one face to the other. Tears came into her eyes. But she smiled.

"No," she said, "I decided it. Jim is going to stay with us." Her glance was upon big Jim, and the joy and love that shone in his eyes went to her heart. "What's the use of our having a son unless he's home with us?"

War Drums

"You will wonder, Mistress, why we are here. I will tell you now about Sani'gilagi, the mountain of the Thunder God, and about Aganuntsi, the Great Conjurer of the Overhills."

For some moments he smoked silently. Presently he took the pipe from his mouth and tapped out the ashes against a rock.

"Once," he said, "I saved the life of Aganuntsi's son when a big bear had the boy down. Aganuntsi made me his blood-brother then, and since then the bond has tightened. Down there, right under us in a deep valley, is a Cherokee town which they call Sequilla. You will see it when the clouds lift. That is where Aganuntsi lives. He is very old now, and he is the Chief Conjurer of all the mountain tribes. And he is the deepest schemer in all the Overhills, and we owe our lives to his scheming.

"Long ago Aganuntsi made up his mind that he needed a mountain of his own where he could concoct his deviltries in secret. In the Cherokee myths, the stories that the old men had handed down, Sani'gilagi was the home of the Thunder God, the Red Man of the Lightning.

"Aganuntsi said that Sani'gilagi was the home also of Tsulkalu, the Master of Game, a slant-eyed invisible giant who strides about over the mountains, and of whom all the Cherokees are afraid. And he said that Tsulkalu had told him to warn all the Indian hunters not to kill game on Sani'gilagi, because the game there was his. Two Cherokee hunters who did not believe him were killed mysteriously not far from the summit, and after that all the others believed him, so that now no Cherokee dares hunt up here, and very few ever come here except Aganuntsi himself.

"HE COMES sometimes, with a great panther which he has tamed, to gather roots for his magic medicines and to talk to Tsulkalu, so he says. But it is a rare thing for any of the others to come."

Almayne turned to Jolie with a grin:

"So you see now, Mistress, why we came to Sani'gilagi when it got too hot for us down yonder. So long as they do not see us from the valley, we are fairly safe on this mountain top."

He stretched his long arms lazily and yawned.

"Come," he said, "the mists are lifting. We can see something now."

A few paces from the brink of the precipice he halted them.

"They have sharp eyes," he explained. "If we stand on the edge against the sky line, they might see us from down yonder."

They stood where they could see everything, yet could not be seen. Almayne waved his hand in a wide gesture.

"The Kingdom of the Cherokees," he said.

Jolie stood silent, her eyes big with wonder, her bosom heaving. The cloud blanket beneath them had disappeared. Spread beneath them now she saw a blue, hazy world of hills and valleys and mountains billowing to the horizon, while, directly in front, her gaze dropped down,

This Happy Girl Went Shopping

EVERY girl knows that Spring is almost here! Even if winter still lingers "around the edges"—and we're all trudging about in waterproof galoshes. It doesn't take the calendar to tell us that the hyacinths and tulips are nodding in the florist windows!

But don't you know how dull and depressing a heavy gray winter coat—or still worse, a black one—can be on a clear, sunny day? In the Spring a young girl's fancy—and older girls, too—turns to clothes.

Perhaps you live on one of those pleasant, country streets with gardens along the road. Or you may go to business every day. Then you are just the girl who will want to know, this month, about the pleasant, easy way that we make money here in The Pin Money Club. Only girls and women belong to the P. M. C. And we have a jolly time together.

If you are a "shut-in" this spring, you can join us, too—for our work can be done right at home. As soon as you've earned enough for a jaunty spring hat, you'll just naturally get better—so that you can get out-of-doors and wear it!

Remember, I mentioned "older girls," too. Mothers—and "youthful grandmothers," as one P. M. C.'er says. She knows, for she is one of them! Mrs. Grant Paige earned $191 with us last spring in her spare time!

I recall a letter that reached me sometime last summer from a slender, willowy girl in Oregon—Lillian E. Peterson. Returning from an early vacation with a hole of $30 in her savings, she immediately turned to Pin-Money work to "repair the damages." This is what she wrote—

"To make a long story short, I managed to make $46.50 during June, July and August. And I didn't work very hard either, for I was too busy having a good time on outings!"

EXTRA dollars—not only this month, but all year round if you wish! That is what I can help you have. Why not write me today? Tell me your plans—and let the P. M. C. help you solve your problems!

down, down—down through space which seemed unfathomable, to a wide, deep valley which the long, humped ridge of Sani'gilagi partly encircled like a wall.

There was a clearing in this valley, she noticed; but except this one clearing, which resembled a tiny lake of vivid green, all the valley floor was clothed in forest, while the great mountains looming beyond were mantled with woods to their rounded summits, where wisps of white cloud still clung.

"The Kingdom of the Cherokees," Almayne repeated. "The Land of the Overhills. What do you think of it, Mistress?"

Jolie did not answer. A faint sound had come to her, a sound so faint that at first she was not sure it was a sound—a strange, low throbbing. Faint as it was, it caught and held her attention instantly, for there was something in it that was compelling and insistent, something cruel and menacing.

"THE war drums!" said Almayne slowly. "They are beating the war drums down in Aganuntsi's town!"

He pointed to the green clearing in the valley far below. Watching it closely, Jolie saw that there were many dark spots in it which were huts or houses, because from some of them thin columns of smoke curled upward.

Jolie shivered. She stepped quickly back, moving farther from the precipice's edge. She had a strange feeling that eyes had been watching her from that distant clearing in the valley under them, and that the war drums were beating because those eyes had seen her.

Day followed day in the little camp on Sani'gilagi's summit. Around the mountain buzzed a hornets' nest of foes. Sometimes Almayne went scouting, sometimes Lachlan, but as a rule they relied for this service upon the two Muskogee braves, Striking Hawk and Little Mink; and day after day these scouts brought back word that the forest below was alive with enemies. Fort Prince George in the upper foothills was only a few leagues distant, and in the region about Sani'gilagi the principal strength of the mountain Cherokees was assembled to support the warriors of the foothill towns, who were besieging the fort.

Because the Cherokees never hunted on the mountain, game abounded close to the camp. They dared not use their rifles, but with improvised bows and with traps of deer sinew they killed squirrels, rabbits, turkeys, grouse, and an occasional deer. On these and on certain roots and vegetables of the woods, in the preparation of which Almayne was marvelously expert, they lived well, cooking their food over a fire so made that almost no smoke rose from it. A clear, cold spring, bubbling from the mountainside a short distance down the slope, provided an abundance of water; and near this spring, in a small natural meadow in the woods, the horses grazed.

There were times when Jolie grew impatient, when she was obsessed with sudden yearning to resume instantly, in the face of all perils, the search for Gilbert Barradell. Yet she was dimly aware that somehow the edge of her impatience had been dulled. She saw much of Lachlan during those days on the mountain, and the hours which she spent with him did not seem to her long.

There was one day when he went scouting, and remained away from dawn to sunset. Jolie grew more and more restless as the shadows lengthened, and twice she went to Almayne and questioned him concerning Lachlan's absence. Again and again that afternoon she was aware that Falcon was watching her; and when, just at dusk, she saw Lachlan's buckskin-clad figure framed in the opening of the trail leading down the mountain, the blood mounted to her face because she knew that Falcon's eyes were fixed upon her.

OVER her whole existence, her whole being, a tinge of unreality seemed to have spread. She was not unhappy. There was something in her, something profound and elemental, which responded quickly to the spell of the wilderness. She had loved it from the beginning.

Though she had learned its deadly ruthlessness, she loved it more than ever now: its beauty, its vastness, its wildness, its teeming, marvelous life. Its magic had conquered many men, who, once having known it, could never be content anywhere else. Now that magic was at work upon Jolie Stanwicke.

And there was something even deeper than this magic of the wilderness. These men with whom her lot was cast in this strange adventure—three of them had become a part of herself, her mind, her soul: O'Sullivan, with his quick humor, his infectious smile, his bird's voice and his stout heart, his sprightly tales of the days when he was a fencing master in Paris, his light love songs, and his beautiful and noble stories of the great days of Greece and Rome; Almayne, in appearance a rude wilderness hunter, blunt, hard as flint, irritable at times, pitiless toward his enemies, scornful of all softness, yet a man of fine texture under his rough exterior, and—now that she had conquered his antagonism—as tender to her as a kinsman; Lachlan McDonald . . .

Over them all she reigned as a queen. They served her because they loved her. Between Falcon's dark, burning passion for her and Almayne's deep joy in her lay a vast gulf. Perhaps as great a gulf separated the love that Mr. O'Sullivan bore her and the love that had been born in Lachlan McDonald for this Lady Sanguilla, as he still called her in his thoughts. She was brave, so brave that her courage was a continuing marvel to them all. She was gay; and they wondered what this gayety must cost her, who was like a caged bird unable to fly to the mate she loved.

And she was beautiful—more beautiful, they thought, than she had ever been before. Her buckskin suit was stained and faded now, its bright embroideries obliterated by dust. Her wide hat was spotted and shapeless. Her olive skin had burned almost as brown as the skin of an Indian girl.

But these things took nothing from her beauty. Indeed, the darkening of her skin enhanced her loveliness, enriching the color of her cheeks, causing her eyes to appear even more brilliant than they had been; and her red-gold hair seemed to them more brilliant too, as though the bright sunshine of the wilderness had burnished and refined it.

DANDRUFF

A Sure Way to End It

There is one sure way that never fails to remove dandruff completely, and that is to dissolve it. Then you destroy it entirely. To do this, just apply a little Liquid Arvon at night before retiring; use enough to moisten the scalp and rub it in gently with the finger tips.

By morning, most, if not all, of your dandruff will be gone, and two or three more applications will completely dissolve and entirely destroy every single sign and trace of it, no matter how much dandruff you may have.

You will find, too, that all itching of the scalp will stop instantly and your hair will be lustrous, glossy, silky and soft, and look and feel a hundred times better.

You can get Liquid Arvon at any drug store, and a four ounce bottle is all you will need.

This simple remedy has never been known to fail.

Lachlan McDonald, watching Lance Falcon keenly, saw that the man was drunk with the beauty of this girl; knew that he himself was intoxicated with the same heady wine.

There was a spot a little below the camp where Jolie sat sometimes in the late afternoons. Here, as dusk deepened, she often caught glimpses of the smaller wild creatures of the woods; yet often her eyes saw nothing of what was before her because her thoughts were elsewhere—in England, perhaps, or in Charles Town, or in the distant Indian town where Gilbert Barradell was a captive.

Strangely, it seemed, her mind would then revert to what Lachlan had told her about the Indian girls—that many of them were beautiful; and always, when her thoughts had taken this channel, they led her quickly to one Indian girl, a girl whom she had never seen, that mysterious daughter of Chief Concha who held Gilbert Barradell prisoner.

A dozen times she had been on the point of questioning Lachlan further about this girl, to get him to tell her exactly what Falcon had said about Concha's daughter during their interview in the "Good Fortune's" cabin. Yet she had never done so, and she knew now that she never would. When she had first questioned Lachlan about the matter, it had led to a quarrel. She was strangely unwilling to mention the subject to him again.

One afternoon, when Jolie sat alone in this retreat below the camp, she saw a sight which brought her instantly back to the living present.

Out from the trees in front of her, not thirty feet away, walked a great panther, a panther which in hue and shape and bulk was like a maneless lion.

The beast did not pause. Slowly, noiselessly it came on, its pale eyes fixed upon her face, its long tail held high above its back.

She could not move, she could not cry out. Utter terror held her rigid, dumb.

Ten paces from her the panther stopped and stood motionless; and suddenly she was aware that behind the panther in the shadow of the trees stood a man.

For an eternity she waited. Then he stepped into full view and advanced toward her, placing his hand upon the panther's head as he passed the beast.

HE WAS an Indian, very old, very tall, perfectly erect. Over his shoulders he wore a cape of feathers, dyed yellow and blue. There were silver bracelets on his bony arms, and white shell-like pendants hung from his long, deeply-slit ears. His creased and wrinkled face was spotted with tattoo marks and ringed with vermilion paint; while from the middle of his head, where a narrow ridge of short, stiff hair rose like a comb or crest, a long, slender green snake dangled and writhed, its forked tongue flickering ceaselessly.

She knew that he was Aganuntsi the Conjurer. Her lips framed the word, though the sound was all but inaudible, and she rose to her feet as he advanced toward her.

For a moment, when he was almost directly in front of her and within arm's length, he looked directly at her, and she shuddered and drew back before the glare of his eyes. But he did not speak or pause. As soundlessly as the great

Tones up the Gums in a special way

PYROZIDE POWDER contains special ingredients that give needed stimulation to gums that are easily irritated or are losing their healthy firmness. It is medicated with Dentinol, which promotes healing.

The effectiveness of Pyrozide Powder in allaying irritated gums has been demonstrated for years in dental clinics. Regular brushing with this remedial dentifrice keeps the teeth thoroughly clean—removes mucoid acid deposits and the daily secretion of salivary deposits (tartar). It aids in keeping the gums hard and firm.

Pyrozide Powder is different and distinctive in taste and ingredients. The refreshed, cleanly feeling of your mouth for two or more hours after using will convince you that it is superior to any dentifrice you have ever used.

A full six months' supply is in the economical dollar package. At all druggists. The Dentinol & Pyrozide Co., Sole Distributors, 1480 Broadway, New York City.

LAW—for Success in BUSINESS

To the man who would rise to a commanding position in business, a sound and practical knowledge of Law is exceedingly valuable. Among the larger business enterprises, the law-trained man is often preferred for the higher executive positions. Many great corporations—the U. S. Steel Corp., for example, the C. B. & Q. R. R., the International Paper Co., the National Biscuit Co., the Mutual Life Insurance Co., the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, the Packard Motor Car Co., the American Sugar Refining Co.—are headed by men of legal training. In the smaller corporations or in one's own business, a knowledge of law spells larger success. For the whole intricate structure of business is based on LAW.

Fit Yourself for Bigger Income

"In looking over the field," writes a prominent Eastern manufacturer, "I find that nearly all the positions commanding a salary of $10,000 or more are filled by men who have studied law." Fit yourself at home, in your spare time, for larger success in business. Full law course leading to degree of LL. B., or shorter Business Law course. LaSalle will guide you step by step. panther gliding at his heels, he strode past her up the slope toward the camp.

Jolie sat down again upon the rock where she had been sitting. She was shaken; her breath was coming fast. After a little, she rose and walked back to the camp on the summit just above. Near the brow of the precipice Almayne and Aganuntsi the Conjurer were seated, while near them the tame panther sprawled lazily in the sun.

Lachlan, Falcon and Mr. O'Sullivan stood apart. The two Muskogee warriors were away, scouting or hunting. Seeing her, Lachlan came toward her. He smiled and greeted her lightly, but she saw anxiety in his face. They walked to where O'Sullivan and Falcon stood, and she noted O'Sullivan's gravity.

For some minutes they stood talking, not venturing to ask one another what Aganuntsi's coming meant. Then Jolie laughed softly.

"This is a great man, this Conjurer," she said. "We must ask him to sup with us, and we must feed him well if we value our lives. Let us prepare the feast."

She was afraid, oppressed with a sense of impending calamity, but she would not show her fear. While she supervised the roasting of two ruffed grouse and the broiling of slices of venison, she chattered lightly or hummed a tune. Before the food was ready, Almayne and Aganuntsi were done talking. The Conjurer rose, and Almayne, too, got to his feet. The Indian raised his right hand, and Almayne returned the salutation. Then Aganunsti strode off along the way he had come, the panther following close behind him.

ALMAYNE strolled slowly toward the group around the fire. Their anxious eyes searching his face found reassurance in his smile.

"By Zooks!" he said as he joined them, "I am as hungry as a mountain bear. I thought the old man would never finish talking of the times we've had together."

He would tell them nothing more. There was nothing more to tell, he insisted. But to Jolie there came again a sense of crisis, of disaster close at hand.

At last the meal was over; the pipes were smoked in the gathering dusk. Little Mink and Striking Hawk returned from their hunting and scouting, bringing with them a turkey and two grouse. With the round moon bathing the mountain top in ghostly light, Jolie bade them all good-night and lay down on the couch of boughs in her little hut of bark and skins.

She had scarcely gone, when Almayne, remarking that he wished to have a look at the horses, knocked out his pipe and arose. Lachlan caught an almost imperceptible movement of the hunter's head, and when Almayne walked toward the trail leading to the spring Lachlan followed him. Out of sight and earshot of the camp, the hunter halted and turned.

Lachlan saw his face in the moonlight, stared at it wide-eyed, and gripped his arm.

"In heaven's name, Almayne!" he exclaimed, "what's amiss?"

"The worst," Almayne answered in a harsh whisper. "Barradell is false to her!"

Sitting on a rock in the moonlight, his head between his hands, Lachlan listened while Almayne talked.

"I learned it by accident," the hunter said. "At first Aganuntsi talked of our hunts in the old days. Then, after a while, he told me that he had returned not long ago from a mission to the Appalaches. He went there to get them to join in this war against the Carolina English, and a hundred Appalaches came back with him, commanded by a Spanish officer.

"Aganuntsi said that he had spent many days in Chief Concha's town. He said that Concha has a new war captain, an Englishman whom he took prisoner. The Spaniards at St. Augustine learned of this somehow, and they ordered Concha to watch the Englishman closely, but not to harm him. Aganuntsi said that Concha has a daughter, the most beautiful girl he has ever seen.

"Well, this girl fell in love with the Englishman. At first Aganuntsi could not remember the Englishman's name, but he remembered it later—Gilbert Barradell."

Almayne paused. Lachlan, his head still supported in his hands, said nothing.

"He married the girl some six weeks ago," the hunter continued, his voice harsher than ever. "It was a real marriage, performed by a Spanish priest. He is mad about her, Aganuntsi says, and she is devoted to him. Concha has made him war chief, and he and his wife spend part of their time in St. Augustine, where they are made much of by the Spaniards."

Almayne tugged at his mustache and glared at the top of Lachlan's bowed head.

"FOR heaven's sake, don't sit there like a stone!" he exclaimed. "What are we to do now? What are we to tell Jolie?"

Lachlan got to his feet slowly, a little unsteadily. He was dazed, his thoughts were a whirling chaos. Almayne seized his arm in a grip of iron and shook it.

"Pull yourself together, man," he said fiercely. "We must think this thing out here—now!"

They talked until late into the night. For a time they were like men struggling to set their thoughts in order again after the impact of some stunning physical shock. An inconceivable thing had happened. It had burst upon them without the slightest warning. At first they could not grapple with it.

Like drowning men clutching at straws, they clutched at the possibility of error, at the possibility that Aganuntsi had manufactured the story for some obscure purpose of his own. But these straws sank under them.

This thing that had happened, Lachlan knew, was a thing that had happened often before. The spell of the wilderness was strong. It made many a man forget the world that he had known, renounce that world forever. The Southern Indians had advanced much further along the road toward civilization than the ruder savages of the North and West.

Their women, especially those of the ruling families or clans, were often beautiful, often highly intelligent, quick of wit and of speech. Many a white man of good birth, already captivated by the lure of the wilderness, had found in some dark-eyed Indian beauty the final and decisive reason for making the New World his home. Often these marriages failed, but sometimes—and Lachlan found double proof of it in his own ancestry—they endured.

No, this incredible thing that had burst upon him like a thunderclap was not incredible. On the contrary, it had happened before and would happen again. But that it should have happened to Jolie Stanwicke, that she should be numbered among those unhappy ones who had been cast aside by wandering lovers to whom the wilderness had called in tones that would not be denied—this was the fact which at first appeared too monstrous to be real.

He knew that he loved Jolie Stanwicke. The love that had been kindled in him had mounted and flamed during those long days on the wilderness trails and on Sani'gilagi's summit. Yet now that love was submerged in pity; for he saw her stricken, blighted, her gallant spirit crushed, the light gone from her eyes.

Within tight lips that did not move he cursed the man who had done this thing—this Gilbert Barradell, whom he had never seen but had always hated because Jolie Stanwicke loved him.

Suddenly a light broke upon Lachlan and brought confirmation, if confirmation were needed, of the thing that Aganunsti had told. His mind leaped back to that first night in Lance Falcon's cabin, when he had played the part of Don Ruy Ortiz of St. Augustine. Every incident of that night was etched upon his memory. He could recall the very words of that puzzling, unexpected question which Falcon had asked so eagerly: "And what of the affair of Chief Concha's daughter?"

So Falcon had known even then! He had known of the existence of this Indian girl, had known that there was something between her and Gilbert Barradell.

IN a flash a new fact dawned upon Lachlan:

Jolie Stanwicke had distrusted Gilbert Barradell! She had been afraid of this thing that had now happened!

It was as plain now as the noonday sun. Lachlan knew now why Jolie had attached so much importance to Falcon's question about the affair of Concha's daughter. He knew now why Jolie had questioned him so eagerly about this Indian girl, why she had sought to learn from him whether the girl was beautiful Yes, she had been afraid of this girl, this daughter of Chief Concha, from the moment when she had learned of the girl's existence. Loving Barradell, yet she had doubted him, had lacked faith in his constancy.

Lachlan could not tell Almayne where these thoughts carried him. Indeed, he himself did not know. He was aware only of a sudden new sense of freedom, as though a weight had been struck from around his neck.

He could not explain this feeling, did not try to explain it. Instead, he turned to the question of what their course should be. Should they tell Jolié at once, or should they wait? It was instinct, perhaps, that determined him upon the latter course; and Almayne, pointing out that weeks might pass before they could leave their refuge on the mountain, could see no reason for haste in imparting to Jolie what they had learned.

This settled, they walked slowly back toward the camp, and saw Mr. O'Sullivan sitting on watch, his white head gleaming in the bright moonlight. The same thought came to them both. Almayne uttered a low whistle and beckoned O'Sullivan. He came to them quickly,

ART training raises incomes quickly

TO BE a doctor or lawyer a young man has to give 3 to 7 years to get ready,—and as many more to establish his practise. In business life it usually takes 5 to 10 years to reach a good income.

If you—whether a young man or woman—like to draw, you have the great advantage of this natural talent, which is in demand in the business world. Splendid opportunities are open to the commercial artist who can make good drawings and designs for advertising. Learn at home by the thorough, practical Federal Course which brings you to the earning point in the shortest possible time.

Many Federal Students earn fine incomes in less time than it takes the doctor or lawyer to get ready. Send now for "YOUR FUTURE," which tells all about "the School famous for successful students," and shows drawings by many who are earning $2000, $4000, $5000, and $6000,—some $10,000 and more.

Test Your Ability to Draw
Send today for our Art Ability Questionnaire,—a fascinating free test of your natural sense of design, proportion, color, perspective, etc. Learn if your talent is worth developing; you will be frankly told what your score is. Use the coupon below, giving your age and occupation.

SUMMER SCHOOLS ON LAKE MAXINKUCKEE and Lachlan told him of the news that Aganuntsi had brought.

For some moments the little man stood silent before them, his head bowed. Then he lifted his face to Lachlan, and they saw that tears were in his eyes, and yet he was smiling, and there was a great content in his face. It was not his habit to talk in riddles, but this time his words left them puzzled.

"I am glad," he said slowly in his bird-like voice. "I have been afraid that she would not discover herself in time. That danger is past now."

When Lachlan stared at him blankly and Almayne swore under his breath, O'Sullivan laughed happily.

"You think I am daft," he told them. "You will see that I am wiser than you two simpletons put together!"

For Lachlan there could be no sleep that night. Presently, while O'Sullivan and Almayne still stood talking, he wandered alone down the steep, narrow trail which led to the spring and the little meadow where the horses grazed. His thoughts were still awhirl. He did not realize that as he passed the spot where O'Sullivan had been sitting on watch, he picked up the Irishman's rapier which had been leaning against a rock. Yet, as always when he walked through the woods, he moved with the noiselessness of an Indian hunter, and, as always, his senses were alert.

Suddenly a faint sound halted him. It might have been one of the horses in the meadow below; but he did not believe that this sound had been made by a horse. More cautiously than ever he moved forward down the steep trail until the meadow opened before him.

THERE in the bright moonlight he saw Lance Falcon standing beside the big roan which he had ridden on the flight to the mountain—the roan which had once been Jock Pearson's.

There was no saddle on the roan, but he was bridled, and Falcon was about to vault upon his back. Lachlan stepped out into the open and strode toward the spot.

Falcon saw him instantly, and the hand which had held the bridle rein leaped to the hilt of his sword. Momentarily a black frown convulsed his face; yet he was smiling as he greeted the younger man.

"Ah, Mr. McDonald," he said coolly, "you have come to bid me farewell?"

Lachlan had halted ten paces away.

"Where are you going, Captain Falcon?" he asked sternly.

For a moment Falcon seemed to hesitate. Then he nodded, as though he had reached a decision.

"A blunt question," he said briskly, "and I shall give it a blunt answer. I am grown aweary of your mountain, Mr. McDonald, and more than a little weary of the rôle of prisoner. I have been, as you are aware, a confidant of the Governor of St. Augustine, and I happen to know something of the Spanish plans to support the Cherokee war against the Carolina English. If those plans were carried out, there are Spanish Indians and a Spanish officer among the Cherokees of this wilderness, and it is in my mind to go to them now and tell them certain things."

"Traitor!" Lachlan flung at him. "You would betray us! Your pledged word—"

Falcon spat out a contemptuous oath.

He moved a step nearer, and Lachlan, watching him keenly, saw the gleam of his white teeth in the moonlight.

"I have played the honorable fool long enough, Mr. McDonald," he exclaimed. "You may consider my pledged word broken if you choose. Spain and the Cherokees are allies in this war—though the Charles Town English know it not—and I have only to ride down this mountain to find myself among friends. Why I have waited so long I hardly know.

"It was a losing game that I was playing on the mountain," he continued calmly. "I think that already Gilbert Barradell is a shadow and Lachlan McDonald has taken his place. But the game is not yet over. I shall come back to Sani'gilagi within a few hours at most, and I shall bring with me my friends from down yonder; and it may be that the lady, having changed her mind once, will change it a second time, seeing that she will have no choice when she rides into St. Augustine as Lance Falcon's bride."

He spoke quietly, as a man might speak to his neighbor about the weather.

"We have a score to settle, Mr. McDonald, and the time to settle it has come. Fortunately, you have a sword in your hand, and the moonlight is well-nigh as bright as day. They cannot hear us on the mountain top. On guard, sir! I am going to give myself the pleasure of killing you before I go."

In an instant his rapier was out. In another instant the moonlight glittered on the crossed blades.

wouldn't pine away, their tone of voice implies, if they never again saw cupboards painted red.

Not everybody is unpleasant, of course. There are lots of people who rave about everything, and almost restore your faith. But, before long, you notice that they're the people who haven't the faintest idea of buying any house. They just think that going through houses that are for sale is as much fun as going to the movies, and cheaper. I got so I could recognize the people who were really considering buying, by their expression of skeptical hopelessness. Some of them would try desperately to be polite, and they were the worst of all. They'd go around saying kind words, but looking as though they'd just bitten the filling out of a back tooth.

When a real estate man has a house of his own to sell, there's no suspicion that he isn't working hard on it. Will brought everybody with whom he thought there was even the faintest ghost of a chance. And it was like the constant drop of water that wears away the hardest stone. I might have continued to like our house if there had only been one or two; but after I'd heard a dozen people say that the bedroom was too small, I began to suspect that the bedroom was too small. And I got so I hated the very sight of those Chinese-red dish cupboards!

Worrying about your weight?

If you weigh too much, you are undernourished. Your food has gone into producing too much fat and not enough vitality. The real you is starving.

That is why overweight people sooner or later lose their sense of well-being—become "too tired to move"—and have shortness of breath, dizziness, or chronic disease. Insurance companies consider them "poor risks."

The Delle Ross System of Reducing is nothing more nor less than correct eating—the kind you like—and plenty of it!

259 lbs. Still reducing

The pictures here are of Mr. Author M. Smith, 806 South 4th St., Minneapolis, Minn. He has written Delle Ross:

"Oh, isn't it a glorious feeling to be able to navigate about without puffing one's self to pieces? You have reduced me without any appreciable discomfort to me at any time. I am greatly in debt to you for pep—my unusual good health, obtained through your reducing without drugs. You have my absolute permission to use my pictures in any advertising. Go the limit and then you couldn't make it half as good as it is."

broke down my pleasure in all the main parts of the house; and then almost everybody had some special little detail that she didn't like, and I began to take on all of them, too. By the end of the month, I wondered how we had ever managed to exist at all in that house for four years.

And then suddenly, in the very depths of my disapproval about our bungalow, a possible buyer came along for the English house. It was the man the J. D. Harvester Company was sending to take the present owner's job, and he seemed to think he wouldn't mind taking the present owner's house along with it. I was nearly wild.

Will is very conservative and, at first, he couldn't see taking the new house until we had got rid of the old one. But finally, his business sense triumphed—the little English house was a real bargain—and he decided to take a chance on it. As he said, of course the bungalow would sell eventually, and with the Moffat property going so well he could swing the buy at once. He said he never did like to spend money he hadn't earned, but that the commissions on the other half of that Moffat land were as good as in the bank already.

The owner of the little English house was in Chicago for a week, but Will got the contract all drawn up, and we were going to sign it as soon as he got back.

After that, I just let myself go on the bungalow. I allowed myself to admit to myself that the bedroom was too small, and that the red cupboards had been a mistake, and that stucco would have been better than clapboards, and that it didn't have a sun-parlor or a laundry, and that the stove was on the wrong side of the kitchen, and about ten million other things that lookers had said.

Of course, we told everybody that we were going to move, and all the girls said the English house was lovely, and how they envied me, and admitted that they'd often wondered how we had got along with such a small bedroom; and Dulcie said that she wouldn't have mentioned it for the world as long as we were living in the bungalow, but that she had always thought those red dish cupboards had been a mistake. It's queer how, once you're moving out of a house, you don't care what anybody thinks about it. I was just interested in the new place; we were to sign the contract in two days, and I had even begun making curtains for the living-room.

AND then, out of a perfectly clear sky, came the thunderbolt. It was Friday, the thirteenth. Nobody can ever tell me that there's nothing in unlucky days. I knew before Will got inside the house that something terrible had gone wrong. I could tell by the way he walked. And he didn't keep me in suspense. Before he had closed the door, he told me.

The Parkway was not going through the Moffat property at all! They weren't going to use the Pike; they were going to use the Sawmill River Road, just as we had heard in the first place!

"But what made them change their minds?" I asked.

Will turned as red as a stop signal.

"They didn't change their minds," he said. "They never had any idea of using the Pike."

"But, Mr. Moffat—the letters from the road commissioner—" I gasped.

Will turned two shades redder.

"Those letters were plain, out-and-out forgeries. Someway or other, Moffat got hold of some stationery with the State letter head, and he typed those letters himself—forged the signatures."

I just stared at Will, speechless. Finally:

"Can't a man be sent to prison for forging?" I asked.

"I don't suppose he ever showed those letters to a soul except me," said Will, "and he'd deny he'd even showed them to me. He played me for a sucker. That's all there is to it."

"Why I never heard of anything so low in my life!"

"And I was flattered that he had come to me instead of one of the older men! He came to me because he knew that I was the only real estate man in the three towns who'd be sap enough to believe him. With his shady reputation! You notice he was careful enough to wait till Dad had pulled out of the business."

"If he'd shown your father letters from the State Road Commissioner—" I began defensively.

But Will was in no mood for consolation. I've never seen any human being so disgusted with himself.

"He'd never have even shown 'em to Dad. You bet he was smart enough to wait till he'd found a sap who'd swallow his bait, hook, line, and sinker. To think that the first thing I should do with the good name Dad took thirty-five years to build up was to start pulling chestnuts out of the fire for R. T. Moffat!"

Will got, if possible, still redder.

"AND he had the nerve to suggest to me that he could make it well worth my while to go right ahead and sell the rest of the land. Intimating that, as long as I'd already sold half, I might as well go ahead and clean up on the deal. He as good as told me that I'd already queered my standing, and that I might as well make something out of it.

"The worst of it is," Will went on bitterly, "that it's true. The people who've already bought that land will always believe that I'm either a crook or an easy mark, and one of those is about as good as the other when it comes to a business man's reputation."

"What can you do?" I asked, aghast at such a choice.

"I can take over all that land, myself, that I've already sold," said Will promptly, "and carry it fifty years or so till it's worth something. That would give me back a perfectly unblemished business reputation, and keep us poor as cheese parings practically for life. Or, I can go ahead as Moffat suggests, which would put us pretty much on Easy Street."

"But with no reputation at all," I finished.

Will shrugged his shoulders.

"Well," he said, frankly, "Jackson Vierley's been mixed up in one or two slightly shady deals over in Verblen; but he seems to be able to keep right on selling real estate. I presume I'd live it down in time."

I said nothing.

"It's a good thing," Will added, "that we haven't already signed up on the new house."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

For a second I sat staring at Will, simply pie-eyed.

At last: "You—you mean we can't buy the new house?" I gasped.

"Of course not," said Will. "That is, not unless I take up Moffat's offer."

"That we've got to stay right on here in the bungalow! With that tiny little bedroom! And no laundry! And—" There was no need to go on through all the million things that were wrong with the bungalow. Not buy the new house! After I'd told all the girls! After I even had the curtains almost made!

Stay on, year after year, in that tiny little bungalow! Already Dulcie was saying they'd got to make a change before long, that their place was too small. And they had only one baby.

Every objection that every possible buyer had made to our bungalow came rushing over me all at once. When I thought of that lovely new English house, the up-stairs porch, the bookcases on each side of the fireplace, the very window where we'd planned to put our two-some chair; the curtains I had already made; what all the girls had said about it; what they would say now. And I was so disappointed, it seemed to me I just couldn't stand it.

"I—just don't see how I can bear it," I said, my voice breaking.

Will looked at me in the queerest way. I remembered that look afterward, though I didn't think much about it then. At the time, I was simply swamped by my own disappointment.

Will had to go to the state capital that afternoon to see Mr. Burris about the Burris Block. He was away overnight and all the next day, and I was left alone with the babies and the prospect of being poor as cheese parings for the rest of our lives. The more time you have to think over a proposition like that, the less you care for it. Why, it wasn't just the English house—it would be everything! All through the years. Trips that Will and I had been counting on for some time, that now we'd never take. Things we'd planned on being able to do for the babies, that now we'd never be able to do. I'd get dowdy with nothing but housework and sewing, and Will would get middle-aged and dull with nothing but the office and mowing the lawn, or shoveling snow and taking care of the furnace. It seemed to me the worst thing in the world that could have happened to us.

But the next day, I knew that it wasn't the worst thing. Will came back and went right to selling the rest of the Moffat property.

"Just forget what I told you the other day," he said. "If anyone asks you, you don't know a thing about the Parkway one way or the other."

AND then, suddenly, I knew that there was something worse than being poor. It had never occurred to me that Will would do anything of the kind. That is why I had cut loose and been so terribly disappointed. It was because it never occurred to me that it was anything but inevitable. If I had dreamed that Will would ever have thought of doing anything of this sort, I would never have let him see that I minded a bit about the house or being poor the rest of our lives.

I remembered now the queer way that

Par-O-Keet Lacquer
New brilliant colors
Dries in an Hour

UNDER the magic spell of Par-O-Keet Lacquer, old, drab furniture becomes gay and fashionable. Bare, time-worn floors are made new and attractive. Ugly woodwork is given life—beauty—decorative value. Even metal work, glass and pottery take on unsuspected beauty.

And how quickly the change is made! For Par-O-Keet is simply brushed on—smoothly and evenly. And it dries in an hour. A piece of furniture can be safely handled within thirty minutes after Par-O-Keet is applied. And inside of an hour the piece is thoroughly dry and ready for use.

See the nearest Lowe Brothers Dealer. He can supply you with Par-O-Keet Lacquer in a wide range of delightful shades. He can suggest many attractive color schemes and combinations. See him today.

If your car has lost the beauty of its finish, and you intend to have it done over in an auto finishing shop, insist that Lowe Brothers Nepto-Lac be used. This wonderful spraying lacquer will make it look as bright and smart as it did in its original lacquer finish. And if you want to try a new color scheme—something brighter perhaps—the beautiful shades of Nepto-Lac will insure a highly satisfactory job.

Will had looked at me when I had said that I just couldn't bear it. He had thought I meant it. And he had made this choice because he thought I couldn't stand by him on the other.

"Oh, Will, you didn't think—" I began. But he cut me right off.

"Just forget every word I said the other day," he repeated. "If anyone outside mentions the Moffat property to you, you don't know a thing about it." He paused a moment. Then he added, "Let's don't talk about it, ourselves, either."

And no matter how often I brought up the subject, he wouldn't speak about it again.

The next day, we signed the contract for the little English house. It was Dead Sea fruit. I looked at the up-stairs porch, and knew that I should never be happy on it. I looked at the bookcases on each side of the fireplace, and wanted to cry.

It's a queer thing! All my life I'd heard that honesty was the best policy, and had figured that it probably was; but it didn't seem to mean much to me, one way or the other. Suddenly now I saw that it wasn't always the best policy—not from a business point of view. Take R. T. Moffat himself, for example. He was utterly dishonest, and yet he had prospered. Take Jackson Vierley, over in Verblen. He wasn't as dishonest as Moffat and he wasn't as honest as Will had always been. Yet he had prospered better than Will, and not as well as Moffat. Why, I could see that there were times when honesty wasn't the best policy at all!

And yet I was most wrong of all in having thought it didn't mean much to me. It meant a terrible lot. When it came right down to brass tacks, I wanted us to be honest, whether it was the best policy or not. I didn't want us to be taupe, like R. T. Moffat, even if it paid.

WILL had said to forget all about it. But I couldn't. I couldn't forget it for a minute, day or night. I thought of what Father would think about it when it came out, what all our friends who didn't do business that way would think. That was bad enough. But someway, there was something that was worse than what anybody would think. It was what Will and I would know. Even if it never came out at all, we would always know! Whenever we'd try to enjoy the new English house, we'd remember what we'd paid for it.

Little Jack would come running up to meet Will with his face all lit up, holding up his chubby little arms, shouting "There's my daddy!" What about when little Jack was old enough to hear the sort of things said about Will that R. T. Moffat's children must hear about their daddy? Would any kind of house that we might be living in then make up for that?

Days went on. The Moffat property was still selling like waffles. There were actually only two or three lots left. When I was over in Verblen to see Dennis O'Shea's sister and get the latest news about Dennis and Louise, I heard a couple of strange men talking. One of them had bought three lots along the "new Parkway," and the other said:

"I wouldn't touch anything R. T. Moffat was mixed up in with a ten-foot pole."

And the first one said: "Young Horton, over in Montrose, is handling this—you know, John Horton's son. He wouldn't be in on it if it wasn't all right."

Some day, men would be talking about our little Jack. They'd say, "Young Horton—you know, Will Horton's son." I couldn't bear to think of it.

THEN I heard about Mrs. Gibson having bought the old Moffat farmhouse. She was a hard-working widow who ran a bakery and was bringing up three children. She told Rosie she was going to fix up the old house and take in tourists overnight. She said, "You know, I'll be right on the Parkway, for there'll be an awful lot of through traffic. The bakery's getting too much for me, what with help being so hard to get. I'll stick at it two or three years more, though, till I get the farmhouse all paid for, and till the Parkway's put through."

And Will had let Mrs. Gibson mortgage her poor savings to buy a house on a parkway that was never going to be there! Queer how much worse that seemed than selling to strange men, and just getting a taupe reputation. It suddenly came over me that for every man who puts over shady deals, there are women like Mrs. Gibson who have to pay for them—whether you know about them or not.

And then I heard that Will was selling one of the lots, on time, to Howard Merton. Howard Merton, his own best friend, Howard Merton with a wife and four babies to take care of!

Suddenly, after that, I knew that I couldn't go on. Will might have asked me not to talk about it to him, might have told me to forget all about it. But there are things you can't forget. He had done it for me. Well, someway or other, we'd have to find some way to undo it, together. Undo it if it kept us down to bedrock all our lives. We were sitting over supper, Will munching away at the celery left on the table. And I knew that we couldn't go on. I'd always heard that love is all, just as I'd always heard that honesty is the best policy. And now I knew that love isn't all. If Will was going to turn into the kind of man who would cheat his best friend, I couldn't go on loving him.

I sat, looking across the table at him, so dear and familiar—so dear. And I couldn't think what to say to start. Two or three times I opened my lips and closed them again. To take a chance of giving up Will forever—I felt cold and sick all over. And I knew that I had to do it. I opened my lips again.

"HOW'D you like, Dotty," Will suddenly spoke, "to sell those Liberty bonds Dad gave the kids, and buy the last lot left of the Moffat property for them?"

I just sat staring at Will, my mouth ajar. There are limits. No human being would put a shady deal over on his own three-year-old children.

"By the time they're twenty-one, it ought to be worth something pretty swell. Right on the Parkway."

"But the Parkway isn't going there!" I stammered.

"You bet your sweet life the Parkway is," said Will.

"But why—how?"

He was grinning from ear to ear.

"'Member when I went up to the capital, to see Burris?" he asked. "Well, I got Burris all pepped up on the prop-

Your reading problem solved by Dr. Eliot of Harvard

THERE will be a dozen competitors for your big opportunity when it comes. What will influence the man who is to make the decision among them?

"In every department of practical life," said Ex-President Hadley of Yale, "men in commerce, men in transportation and in manufactures have told me that what they really wanted from our colleges was men who have this selective power of using books efficiently."

Not book-worms; not men who have read all kinds of miscellaneous books. Not men who have wasted their whole leisure time with the daily papers. But those who have read and have mastered the few great books that make men think clearly and talk well.

What are those few great books? How shall a busy man find them? The free book offered below answers those questions; it describes the plan and purpose of

Dr. Eliot's Five-Foot Shelf of Books

The books that make men think straight and talk well

Every well-informed man and woman should at least know something about this famous library.

The free book tells about it—how Dr. C. W. Eliot put into his Five-Foot Shelf "the essentials of a liberal education;" how he so arranged it that even "fifteen minutes a day" are enough; how in pleasant moments of spare time, by using the reading courses Dr. Eliot provided for you, you can get the knowledge of literature and life, the culture, the broad viewpoint that every university strives to give.

Every reader of this page is invited to have a copy of this handsome little book. It is free, it will be sent by mail, and involves no obligation of any sort. Merely clip the coupon and mail it to-day.

Dr. Charles W. Eliot, for forty years president of Harvard University; Editor of the most famous library in the world, "Dr. Eliot's Five-Foot Shelf of Books." You can buy these books by the Collier plan which enables you to enjoy them while you are paying for them.

osition. Proved to him how the Pike was the way the Parkway really ought to go. No blasting, take in the lake drive, and so on. He's a good friend of the road commissioner, and knows most of the Parkway Commission. He had me talk to 'em—he's got an awful lot of influence politically, you know. And—well before I came back, he had the commission sold on running the Parkway along the Pike."

I never saw a human being look more tickled over anything.

"Will," I wailed, "why—oh, why didn't you tell me?"

"I didn't dare tell a living soul, not even you," said Will. "If the faintest whisper had got to R. T. Moffat, he'd have trebled the price on that property quicker'n you can sign your name. I had to keep him thinking he was pulling the wool over my eyes, getting away with another slick deal. It gave me the chance to get all my friends in on the ground floor for something really good. I took an option on ten acres, myself, and have turned 'em all over. We've made a pretty piece of change ourselves out of it."

"But, Will—"

"I didn't like to keep you in the dark," he went on apologetically. "I knew you wouldn't tell anybody, but there might have been something in your manner that would have tipped our mit. It was the safest way." He paused a moment. "Of course," he added, "I knew you'd know I'd fixed things all right, one way or another."

"Oh, Will,"—I was so sick of misunderstanding and deceit, I had to come right out with the confession—"I was afraid you hadn't. I don't know why I shouldn't have trusted you. But I—I thought you'd done the crooked thing—for me."

For a few seconds Will just stared at me. Then:

"No," he said levelly, "I wouldn't do a thing like that—not even for you."

As soon as he'd said it, he felt terribly guilty.

"You know it isn't that I don't love you enough to, but I—we—I—"

Oh, he needn't have tried to explain, needn't have felt guilty. Hadn't I felt just the same about loving him? That I couldn't have gone on loving him if he hadn't been the man he is?

Tears that I'd been holding back for weeks came suddenly tumbling out. I ran around the table, climbed up into his lap and buried my face in the shoulder of his sweater in sheer heavenly relief.

"I guess we both feel just the same," I said at last. "You know, like the verse—

"Yet, this inconstancy is such
As you too shall adore—
I could not love thee, dear, so much Loved I not honor more."

Will nodded, rubbing his cheek against my hair. But he is not much given to spouting poetry. Pretty soon, he began to chuckle.

"There's just one little thing I could still wish for," he said. "And that's that I could see R. T. Moffat's face when the first Parkway surveyor comes down the Pike!"

Rölvaag the Fisherman Shook His Fist at Fate

show what was in me. It seemed such utter nonsense!

"But I had to keep on with the fishing to earn my living; and two more years went by. At last I wrote to my uncle, a wandering member of the family, who had emigrated to South Dakota. I asked him if he could send me a ticket to America. I said that I would pay him back after I arrived. One day the next summer the ticket came.

"Annually a great market was held at the little town of Björn, about twenty English miles from my home. This event was always looked forward to with a great deal of excitement, for people from many districts would come thither to trade. There was much merry-making, much drinking and dancing.

"I sailed over with my master, the old sea king who had saved my life two years before. On the way I told him my plans—that I was going to quit the fishing and emigrate to America. He objected fiercely, wouldn't listen to it. 'Come here,' he said as soon as we got ashore; 'I want to show you something.'

"He led me down among the new boats exposed for sale, the finest fishing craft of their kind on the coast of Norway. We looked them all over; at last he picked out the best boat of the lot, a brand-new hull built to carry a crew of five men. She looked fine to me. I thought I had never seen such a handsome craft. We went down under her hull, stood at her bow and gazed aft, squinted along her bilge, then moved to her stern, and examined the fine lines of her run. The old Viking suddenly leaned over and patted her smooth side with the palm of his hand. He looked at me a long while with deep-set eyes. At last he spoke:

"'As you know, I am a fairly well-to-do man,' he said. 'I like you, and you like me. You are making a great mistake. If you will send back that ticket to your uncle, I will buy this boat for you.'

"Well, you can imagine! Never in my wildest fancies had I dreamed of such a thing coming to me at this time. Here was success at the start, material success, along with the backing of the man I respected above all others. I can honestly say that I have never felt such a surge of pride and power, such a sense of achievement, as came over me at that moment. Yes; it made me proud and happy—and, very, very sad.

"The sadness followed like a tidal wave. Because, you see, it didn't change anything. I had already been over the whole ground, settled my plans, and this generous offer only complicated everything in a way that tore my heart.

"'Thank you, sir,' I said shortly. 'I will have to think it over. Give me till to-night.' Then I turned and left the row of new boats, walked through the town, and climbed the hill behind it. I hardly saw where I was going. Somewhere up on the hillside I sat down. I sat there all that afternoon."

IT WAS in the library of his home in the quiet college town of Northfield, Minnesota, that Professor Rölvaag first told me this story. We had smoked and talked till long after midnight while a snowstorm raged outside. Thousands of miles of land and water separated us from the coast of Norway; but the gulf between the unlettered boy on the hillside and the famous teacher and author who sat before me was scarcely to be measured.

"It was a fine, clear day in Nordland," he resumed abruptly. "I could see a long way across the water. I sat there gazing off across the fjörd trying to make out the unsubstantial shapes of my dreams and aspirations. What ought I to do? How could I refuse such a splendid offer? It was as if my little world had laid a plot against me, as if Satan were tempting me with a kingdom.

"Down below in the town they were having a jolly time, drinking, dancing, lovemaking, light-hearted and free. The sound of it came up to me. I might have been the gayest of the lot; but now I felt entirely cut off from the others. I had to decide something, life had made me tragic. Would my heart stop aching as I set sail, as I paid for the boat and grew prosperous as the years went by?

"On the other hand, what was my heart aching for? I honestly didn't know. If I decided to refuse this wonderful offer, what reasonable excuse could I make? What precisely did I expect to do out in the great world? You see, I had no valid excuse, or none that could be put into words. I just felt that I wasn't fulfilling myself. I wanted to go away, find out what the world was like, and see if I didn't fit in somewhere else. But how can you explain that to sensible, practical people? To their minds, you're simply acting like a headstrong fool."

Rölvaag remained silent quite a while, listening to the storm outside. "There was more to it than that, of course," he announced suddenly. "Long ago, as a mere boy, I had dreamed of being a writer. But there had been only two occasions when I had ever revealed this dream to a living soul. The first time was one day when I had been gathering kelp on the rocks with my mother. We were very poor, you know; I remember winters when we had nothing but salt herring and potatoes to eat, three times a day. We used to gather sea weed or kelp and boil it to feed the cows; there was scant grass on our rocky island.

"As Mother and I were coming home from the ledges that afternoon, she took my hand and asked me what I wanted to be when I grew up. 'I want to be a poet,' I told her seriously. At that she smiled—I shall never forget that smile. She was thinking of the few potatoes there were left at home, and of how much harder it was to be a poet than a fisherman.

"The other time was several years later; I must have been ten years old, and had suddenly decided to write a novel.

Reduces the Cost of Razor Blades to the Vanishing Point

Who Else Wants Keen, Cool Shaves at Less Than ¼ Cent Apiece?

IMAGINE the joy of having a never-ending supply of super-keen razor blades always on hand, ready to use at a moment's notice! No more continual bother about remembering to buy new ones! No more "raking" and scraping with dull ones! . . . And all at an average cost of less than a quarter cent apiece! Think of it!

In All the World—No Shaves Like These!

To-day over one million American men are enjoying this shaving luxury . . . For KRISS-KROSS is absolutely unique. The way this amazing invention rejuvenates razor blades and multiplies their sharpness has set new standards in the cutlery world. The smoothest blade you ever encountered in all your previous shaving experience is just a sample of what KRISS-KROSS can give you day after day—and month after month!

Makes Blades Last Almost Indefinitely

KRISS-KROSS is more than a stropper—for it makes blades last—and last—and LAST! Many cases are on record where a single blade has stayed 100% keen for over 365 days of daily use! And thousands of men who formerly used a blade 4 or 5 days at best, now write us that 30 to 50 shaves are the very least they get since using KRISS-KROSS! Just figure the saving!

KRISS-KROSS sharpens any kind of razor blade on the market (except Durham). Uses the master-barber's secret diagonal stroke. Automatic flip-flop action and automatic decreasing pressure. Strops heavy at the start—light at the finish. Takes only 11 seconds to do the trick. Automatic jig flies up to notify you when your blade is ready with the keenest cutting-edge that steel can take!

Special Offer Now

KRISS-KROSS is never sold in stores but is demonstrated by authorized representatives in each locality. If there is no representative near you, mail the coupon below for interesting, illustrated explanation of KRISS-KROSS, together with our generous introductory offer now in force. In spite of the poverty of our educational advantages up there under the Arctic Circle, we did a lot of reading; there was a good library in our home community, maintained by the State. At that age I had read a good deal of the world's classical romantic literature, all in good Norwegian translations. My imagination was developed far ahead of any other faculty.

"So I decided to write a novel of my own. I worked away at it pretty hard, writing in the room that I shared with my older brother and keeping the manuscript strictly out of sight. He soon discovered that I was doing something in our room that he didn't know about. One day he burst in unexpectedly and found me writing. 'What have you got there?' he demanded—I stood rather in awe of this brother, you know. 'Nothing,' I answered, hastily gathering up my poor little manuscript and trying to hide it. 'Let me see,' he cried, snatching at the paper. 'I won't!' I screamed, protecting my secret as best I could. We fought up and down the room, breaking chairs and overturning the table. The manuscript was torn into shreds, but I managed to keep it from him; at least he never got a sight of it. Someone came in and separated us. It wasn't until fifteen years later, when I was a senior in St. Olaf College, half a world away, that I attempted literary composition again.

"BUT at the time I'm speaking of, when I had been offered the boat, all that had been pretty well knocked out of me. I'd learned how to earn my living; I was a successful fisherman. The only thing that remained to me of my boyish dreams was a deep restlessness. I felt as if I had gone as far as I could go in the fishing life, and it wasn't anywhere near far enough. I had experienced the battle with the elements; but there were other battles that I longed for, more interesting and infinitely harder, the battles of the mind and spirit. I knew that somewhere there was a better test of me.

"And I finally did manage to make up my mind that afternoon, though it meant a heartbreaking struggle. I came down into the town at last and hunted up my master, the old Viking. I marched straight up to him and looked him in the eye, a deep, piercing eye it was too. 'I'm sorry, sir,' I said, 'but I cannot accept your offer. I have decided to go to America.' He regarded me a long while in silence. 'You're a damned fool!' he said, and turned away."

Rölvaag laughed. "I saw the old man when I visited Norway two years ago. He was still vigorous and noble-looking, like a great pine tree. His voice had the sound of the sea in it; his hand closed on mine with a grip of iron. He was the finest figure of a man I have ever seen. His first words to me were: 'I'll never forgive you for not taking that boat!' 'You don't think I have done very well?' I asked—in his presence one always felt humble. 'Oh, well enough, perhaps,' he answered. 'But you were born for the sea.'"

I had been thinking as Rölvaag told me this story that there must have been more than a little of the old Viking temper in his own blood. The lust for adventure, the desire to conquer life, the reckless impulse to cut loose from home, to go sailing away, to seek out battles for the sake of winning them, and the utter faith in his power to kill any dragon he might meet, wasn't this his best explanation? Listen to the tale of his coming to America:

"I WENT to a port down the coast and took ship for the New World. I was nothing but a boy from the provinces, ignorant of travel, of how to handle myself, of where I was going. You'll have an idea of the extent of my wardrobe when I tell you that I wore one shirt from Norway to South Dakota; it had its last washing the day before we arrived in New York. The ocean voyage was only a pleasure for me; the sea was my home. Meals were furnished with my ticket, there were plenty of Norwegians to talk to, and I had nothing to worry about except to wonder what would happen when I got ashore.

"But when I landed in New York things were very different. It was the month of July, in the year 1896. The vast harbor, the teeming city, and the alien language all around me threw me into a terrible confusion. I couldn't speak or understand a word of English. It wasn't till I got on board the train that I discovered that meals weren't furnished with my railroad ticket. By that time I was down to ten cents in American money, and a copper pocket-piece from Norway. No money, no food. I went without food for three days and three nights, all the way from New York to South Dakota.

"I left the train at a little station on the Dakota prairie. Looking around, I saw nothing but level land, like the sea. My uncle was to have met me, but had made a mistake in the day of my arrival. I tried to ask my way, but no one at the station spoke Norwegian. At last a Swede who worked on the railroad came along, and I was able to communicate with him. He thought he knew approximately where my uncle lived, and gave me some directions; it seems that I had a twelve-mile walk ahead of me. When he found that I hadn't eaten a mouthful for three days, he gave me what remained in his dinner pail—one sandwich and some cold coffee. I've always blessed that big Swede in my prayers!

"By this time the sun was going down. I struck out on foot, soon lost my way, and walked far into the night. It was one of those still prairie nights, breathless with heat. I've learned to love them since, but then I was worn out and discouraged. I felt as if I had been dropped down in the midst of nowhere. At last I came upon something in the darkness, a man driving a horse hitched to a wagon. The man was a Norwegian and he took me to the farm where my uncle was employed. I stumbled into the house more dead than alive."

Rölvaag brooded a while when he had finished this tale. "In that experience I learned the first lesson of the immigrant," he said soberly. "The first and perhaps the greatest lesson: A feeling of utter helplessness, as if life had betrayed me. It comes from the sense of being lost in a vast alien land. In this case it was largely physical; but I soon met the spiritual phase of the same thing. The sense of being lost in an alien culture. The sense of being thrust somewhere outside the charmed circle of life. If you couldn't conquer that feeling, if you couldn't break through the magic hedge of thorns, you were lost indeed. Many couldn't, and didn't—and many were lost thereby."

Now Rölvaag went to work as a farm laborer. He kept at it three years, until he was twenty-three. During this period he picked up a smattering of English such as was used on Norwegian-American farms of those days, but he wasn't making much progress toward becoming a college professor or a great novelist. He managed to lay up a little money, however.

"In the fall of 1899, I decided to leave the farm," he resumed. "I didn't know what to do. By chance I ran into a fellow I had known for the last three years, who had been urging me to send myself to school in America. He brought out the old argument again, and begged me to give it a try. The winter term was just beginning; I might as well invest my savings in a little schooling.

"It's hard to explain my own lack of initiative in this respect, and yet it was very simple. You see, I had been a failure at school in Norway, while my older brother had been a brilliant success. When my father took me out of school at the age of fourteen, he had told me bitterly that education was not for me. And I had believed it; the iron had sunk deep into my soul.

"But this time my friend's arguments prevailed; as an escape from the farm I started going to an academy in a nearby town. Then a wonderful thing happened. I was twenty-three years old, remember, a man of mature mind and pretty full experience. The moment I came in touch with books and study it was as if a heavy curtain had been lifted. I found that I loved study passionately. I found that I was able to learn with extraordinary ease. I found that this was what I had always wanted. I found that the great world of the mind was simply waiting for me to enter in.

"As a matter of fact, you see, I was really better educated at that moment than I knew. Life had educated me, and reading had educated me. My imagination was fully developed, my reasoning powers were mature, and work had taught me concentration. The chief things I needed were a knowledge of English and an understanding of the technique of scholarship; in other words, the means of placing myself in the American scene."

THE way Rölvaag ate up the next seven years of scholastic training is a marvel, and shows how definitely his genius was urging him on. After spending parts of three years in the preparatory school, he entered St. Olaf College in the fall of 1901. There he took the full four-year course. Every penny for his upkeep had to be earned; there was no one to fall back on, and no home to go to in summer if he couldn't find a job.

For two summers he traveled as a salesman in the country. As soon as the week was half gone, he would find himself heading for a town that had a good library: "I'd do as much work as possible the first three days," he said. "Then by Thursday I'd drift into town, get a back room in a cheap hotel, visit the library and read night and day over the week-

"Why suffer from Corns when you can get instant relief so easily?"

A corn is no trivial thing. Its pitiless throb torments your nerves; squanders your energy; gives your face a pinched expression; takes the grace out of your walk and the joy out of life.

Getting rid of corn troubles is simply a matter of removing the cause—friction and pressure of shoes—nothing more. Once you do that a corn will heal itself.

A corrective has at last been perfected that does this. Millions have adopted it with such gratifying success that they no longer know what it means to suffer from corns.

Wm. M. Scholl, M. D., noted orthopedic scientist, and inventor of many scientific appliances for the more serious forms of foot trouble, solved this old, old problem.

It is a thin, protective, healing pad that acts on the principle of correction and absorption. It is called Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads. There is nothing else like it.

Put one on—the pain is gone! The effect is instantaneous. Instead of medication to deaden the nerves, it is a corrective to protect the toes from the pressing and rubbing of the shoe!

The good results are immediately apparent. You feel no more pain from the corn than if you never had one.

If applied at the first sign of irritation, Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads positively prevent corns—make it impossible for you to have one.

Old time ways of fighting corns with powerful liquids and caustic plasters are wrong in principle, because they ignore the cause—and dangerous, because they expose the toes to acid burn.

Zino-pads are absolutely safe—won't harm the tenderest skin. They are made in special sizes, also, for Callouses and Bunions. Buy a box today. On sale at all drug, shoe and dept. stores—35c.

For Bunions

Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads for Bunions stop pain at once, protect the swollen joint from rubbing and pressing of shoe. Safe, soothing, healing.

For Callouses and Burning Soles

Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads for Callouses immediately relieve pain and remove the friction and pressure of the shoe. Also instantly effective in relieving burning soles.

end. I lived for that, week by week; the rest of it was just lost motion."

But nothing could have stopped him now; he was on the right road at last. The sheer joy of development was satisfying secret longings that had driven him out from the land of his forefathers. Every day in school was a test and an achievement. Something in the energy and efficiency of American life fired all his ambition. Men did great things over here; well, he would do great things too.

He was graduated from college in 1905 with honors. At once he was offered a faculty position, provided he would go a year to the University of Oslo, in Norway. This he did, borrowing money for the purpose. After taking his anden Examen at Oslo, in 1906, he joined the staff of St. Olaf College, where he has been teaching ever since.

Rölvaag's literary bent began to show itself while he was still a student; he wrote his first long novel as a senior in college. It was never published, but he likes to keep the manuscript. "It's a pretty good novel for a beginner," he said, as he showed it to me one day. His first published work, "Amerika-Breve, or "Letters from America," came in 1912.

Other novels have followed at intervals of two years. Wholly American in their scene and viewpoint, all of Rölvaag's books have been written in the Norwegian language, because this is the language in which he finds it easiest to express himself fully.

BUT language has nothing to do with the intense Americanism of these people of Norse stock in the Northwest. One could hardly imagine a more typical American than Rölvaag himself; it is difficult to think of him as the immigrant boy of thirty years ago. He speaks English with hardly an accent. He was naturalized as soon as the law permitted. He married an American, and all his children have been born in Minnesota.

He is fond of relating an incident which revealed America to him. It happened when he was coming back from the University of Oslo in 1906. "I had landed that morning in New York," he says, "and was on my way to spend the day with friends. I found myself on a street car somewhere in Brooklyn. A huge furniture van had got stuck in front of the car; the horses were balky, and refused to move. The car stopped and a large crowd gathered, while the driver of the van tried various ways of starting his balky horses. The suggestions from the crowd didn't improve his temper. The street was completely tied up; the horses had decided to stay right where they were.

"All the while our motorman was clanging his bell impatiently. At last, he couldn't stand it any longer. He turned on the power, brought his car up behind the van, and began to shove. By George, those horses had to move! He shoved them for nearly two blocks, van and all, while the crowd cheered and the bell clanged, and the driver shouted and swore, and the horses struggled to resist. But it wasn't any use. At last, they suddenly decided to behave themselves—gave up the battle and went on of their own accord.

"And all the while I sat there in the car thrilled to the core of my being. Something had come over me like a wave. This was America—hurry and rush, clang, clang, over the top—if you can't do it one way, try another! Such a thing as that would never have happened in a European street; such a thing as that would never have been done by a European motorman. And I liked it, I liked it. Tears came to my eyes. This was America, my country. I had come home."

HOW the book that has made Rölvaag famous came to be written is a romantic incident in itself. For years he had been thinking of a novel of pioneering, but had not found time to write it, in the press of teaching. The four novels he had already written had been dashed off at odd times during his summer vacations. Then one day he picked up a newspaper and read that an eminent Norwegian novelist was planning to make a brief visit to the Northwest to collect data on which to base a novel of immigrant life.

"This news infuriated me," says Rölvaag. "Here I had been, preparing myself for just such a work, living the life, suffering the pangs of it, fighting an uphill fight; when along comes a successful Norwegian author fresh from his study and proposes to steal my thunder! But it wasn't personal jealousy I felt—it was artistic jealousy. I didn't believe that a novel of pioneering could be written from the study point of view. It had to be written by one who understood and even shared the psychology of the immigrant. Otherwise, it would be thin and artificial.

"I thought the matter over for a few days, but I still saw red. This man would probably stop at hotels, attend banquets and make speeches, give interviews to the newspapers, and spend a little time talking with village characters; while I'd been sweating blood for years to collect not only the material for that novel, but its heart and soul as well.

"I went to the president of our college and asked him for a year's leave of absence. Heaven knows I could ill afford it, but the die was cast now. Then I dug away to my cabin in the northern part of Minnesota—it was the beginning of the summer vacation—and started to write. I wrote there all summer; in the fall I visited South Dakota again, then went abroad. I stopped for some time in London, a city I had always longed to know; put up at a cheap immigrants' hotel, wrote day and night, and walked the streets when I needed exercise. In midwinter I went on to Norway, and there I finished Book One of "Giants in the Earth."

This book was accepted at once by a leading Norwegian publisher. From the moment of its appearance in Norway there was no longer any doubt as to the wisdom of Rölvaag's tremendous life effort.

The way "Giants in the Earth" arrived at an English translation and was finally published in America is still another romance. It came about through the chance meeting of two sailors in the inland city of Minneapolis, one from the north coast of Norway, the other from the coast of Maine. When Rölvaag landed in New York as an immigrant boy in 1896, I was still going to sea with my father in the bark "Harvard," and must have been somewhere in the China Sea at the time. Later, he and I entered college the same year, fifteen hundred miles apart; and later still we published our first books the same year. It seems a strange turn of fate that we should have met in far-off Minnesota, like two ships drifting together in a calm; and that from the moment of our meeting we should have begun to exert such an influence on each other's lives.

Rölvaag had not had a complete or acceptable English translation of the book done when I first met him. He was skeptical of its reception by the American reading public, and had given up all thought of publishing here. I urged him to go ahead, and ended by spending months in rewriting the English version of "Giants in the Earth," as well as doing a biographical introduction.

Rölvaag is a born novelist. His chief interest is in stories of people—twists and turns of human nature. He watches life narrowly. Character and psychology are his main studies; he believes that the art of the novel depends wholly on characterization. "I am a realist," he says; "I want a reflection of life on the page, not an artificial plot. A true portrayal of any life scene carries its own plot, but it must be faithful in detail."

RÖLVAAG is still at the head of the Norwegian department at St. Olaf College, with four teachers under him. He teaches eight hours every week, is secretary of the Norwegian-American Historical Association, keeps up his reading in two languages, writes regularly every day, watches life, takes an eager part in it, and especially has an eye out for students of talent whom he can help by personal contact. Fame has not affected him in the least, and will not affect him.

"A man doesn't fight steadily for thirty years, carrying a dream in his heart, and get nowhere in particular," he said, "to go off the handle at the first stroke of good luck that comes his way. He has learned a few things by that time if he is any good. And one of these things is the vanity of fame.

"Not that I'm bitter, or sorry to have won a little recognition. I love the world just as it is, and am happy for everything it chooses to give me. My chief satisfaction is in seeing that it's all been necessary and worth while—the struggle, I mean. I've had a hard and even tragic life, but not the sort of life to make me sour.

HOMING PIGEONS were the surest of all battlefield messengers—more dependable, even, than marvelous mechanical devices used by front-line troops to keep in touch with their sources of supply. The "Lost Battalion" might well have been utterly wiped out but for a pigeon that delivered its message, despite a severe wound received in the flight from the front. This, and many other stories about hero pigeons and racing pigeons, is thrillingly told next month in an interview with Uncle Sam's leading pigeon authority.

TEETH must help to save themselves

SIX MONTHS AGO a gentleman in Chicago rose to address a meeting of dental experts. The next morning, one of his remarks was quoted on newspaper front pages all over the country. It was news—startling and slightly terrifying news . . . "In all America," said the gentleman from Chicago, "there are probably only twenty sets of perfect natural teeth."

ONE hundred and seventeen million persons in America – and twenty perfect sets of teeth among them! . . . Is it lack of care? Surely not – with tooth-brushes and dentifrices selling by carloads, and tens of thousands of dentists keeping always as busy as bees! . . . No, we Americans, as a whole, are making noble efforts to save our teeth. But why, why, why – inquire the hard-worked dentists in chorus – can't people learn that teeth must help to save themselves?

Teeth were made to work. They can't be healthy unless they do work. And America's teeth have precious little work to do! Soft, mushy, over-refined foods make up the greater part of our diet. No chewing – no exercise – no proper circulation – no real stimulation of muscles and membranes and tissues. So a whole nation – generation after generation – goes to the dentist oftener and oftener! . . . There's the whole story in a nutshell.

Look at the Africans and the Eskimos and the ancient Egyptians, if you don't believe it! All blessed with superb teeth, so long as they remained primitive peoples. All subject to dental ills a-plenty, once civilization had accustomed them to its soft and deficient foods.

Now you can, of course, give your teeth some measure of exercise without actual chewing. You can spend a half-hour or so every day "vigorously massaging the gums." You can "bite down hard, again and again," upon some firm and resisting substance. . . .

But why – the distracted dentists inquire again – why in the name of common sense, don't you do as Nature intended you to, and simply add to your diet foods that must be thoroughly chewed? It's far and away the easiest and least expensive method, – and the only completely efficacious one!

Prominent among foods that dentists strongly recommend to their patients is Grape-Nuts. The delicious nut-like flavor and tempting crispness of these golden kernels persuade you to chew. Really chew – giving to teeth and gums exercise they must have for health and beauty. And what's more, Grape-Nuts plays an important part in tooth building also, because of valuable elements contributed by the wheat and malted barley from which it is made.

Grape-Nuts supplies phosphorus for teeth and bones; dextrins, maltose and other carbohydrates for heat and energy; iron for the blood; proteins for muscle and body-building; and the essential vitamin-B, a builder of appetite. Eaten with milk or cream, Grape-Nuts is an admirably balanced ration.

Try this famous food tomorrow morning. Children need it, too – for its nourishing qualities and its crispness. It is ready-to-serve, and you can get it at any grocer's. Perhaps you would like to accept the offer below:

The Highway to Success

THE highway to success and independence is paved with more than good intentions. To achieve these natural goals of human ambition, one must lay out a sound financial policy and adhere to it.

One of the most important features of a sound personal financial policy is sound investment.

To live on less than one makes, to lay by a surplus regularly and invest it safely—these are essential to success.

S. W. STRAUS & CO. can be of help and service to you in building up a competency through safe investments. For 46 years, we have been dealing in safe investments. We suggest that you write for our new booklet, "Investing for Safety", which will aid you in solving your investment problem. It will be sent without charge or obligation. Simply ask for

THE FAMILY'S PROBLEMS

A Budget Wouldn't Work for Us, But We Found a Plan That Would

I LEARNED my most important financial lesson from a pipe organ in the church where my mother was organist. It was one of those old-fashioned organs in which the "wind was kept up" by a hand bellows, and it was my duty to keep the wind up. I had to pump the organ during church service. At choir practice also, I was on hand with the necessary air. If my mother wanted to practice, the call was sent out for me.

I used to hate that job; but I realize now that that old organ, with its wheezy pipes and the carved initials on the back, taught me a valuable lesson—a lesson in how to handle the family's money.

For to-day we apply the same principle to our family accounts that I used to apply to the organ: we set a notch, and we keep on pumping the money into the bank until that notch is reached. That's all there is to it, and it works.

Suppose we have $200 in the bank. We set the notch at $225, which we are determined to have at the close of the month. We watch the bank balance. If it isn't climbing by the middle of the month, we begin to cut down on expenses. The first thing we sacrifice is amusements. If that doesn't bring it up, we get less expensive things to eat—buying the cheaper cuts of meat, and using the top of the morning milk for our coffee. Practiced continuously, these petty economies would probably prove irksome. But as special emergency measures, they put us on our mettle. With the $225 as a definite goal ahead of us we spend nothing rashly until it is reached.

I write newspaper, trade paper, and magazine articles, and my income is rather irregular. If we run over the amount in the middle of the month, well and good. We get something for the house—an awning for the porch, a new rug, or linoleum for the kitchen.

If we don't quite reach the mark one month, we economize desperately the next. Rigid economy for two months will always bring the balance up to par.

We tried the budget system with disastrous results. Like the farmer who fed his horse one ear of corn less each day, we reduced the amount spent for food every month, until we were spending less than thirty dollars, after which my wife got anemia, and I got a doctor's bill that came to a great deal more than the original food would have cost. So we are off the budget system for life. Budgeting may do for some families, but we take things too seriously to go in for it.

But by setting the notch a little higher each month, and gradually increasing the financial air pressure, we have money and save it too. As fast as we get a couple of hundred dollars, we put it into improvements about the place, or securities for our old age.

Those of you who hark back to the days before the water- and electric-motor-pumped organs will know exactly what I mean. But for those who have never had the privilege of pumping an old-fashioned organ, I will say that it is the best little financial lesson I have ever had. We've settled down to the system, and intend to keep using it the rest of our respective lives.

We've Discovered a Painless Way of Saving

I AM a lawyer, and my income varies greatly. Some months I earn barely enough to pay office rent and my stenographer; other months I will be fortunate, and take in enough money to last me for several months together.

My wife and I tried several plans of saving money before we hit on the one that seems ideal for our case. We call it the "percentage system." It consists simply in saving a certain percentage of our income each month.

We started out with the resolve to save 5 per cent of our income. That's a low figure, but we did not want to make the mistake of trying to save too much. The first month under our plan, I earned just $100, so we placed 5 per cent of it, or $5, in a savings account. The second month I made $150—$7.50 of it went into the new account. At the end of six months we found we had saved $45 without missing the money at all.

So we decided to raise our percentage to 8 per cent. By the end of a year we had $150. We were very jubilant over it. It wasn't a large amount, but we had found a system that worked, and worked without any hardship to us.

Beginning our second year under this plan, we increased our percentage to 10 per cent, and we have kept it there ever since. Every month when I close my books and determine what my income has been, I immediately transfer 10 per cent of the amount to our savings account.

After ten years of this system, we have $3,000 in the bank. My income is about $5,000 a year, which means we are saving at the rate of $500 annually.

I am thirty-five years old. Interest tables tell me that, if I continue to save at that rate and get 6 per cent on my savings, I will have something over $25,000 by the time I am fifty-five.

When we want to save up to buy furniture, or a radio, we establish special savings accounts. We never disturb what we consider our "old-age fund" on any account.

Our system is painless. Months when our income is small, our savings are also small. When I have a good month, we do not miss the large amount that goes into the bank.

The percentage is, of course, optional. Some people could save 15 per cent or 20 per cent very easily. Other people, could adopt 5 per cent as their basis, and still accumulate considerable money over a period of years.

Sunset Pass

By ZANE GREY

THE dusty overland train pulled into Wagontongue about noon of a sultry June day. The dead station appeared slow in coming to life. Mexicans lounging in the shade of the platform did not move.

Trueman Rock slowly stepped down from the coach, grip in hand, an eager and curious expression upon his lean dark face. He wore a plain check suit, rather wrinkled, and a big gray sombrero that had seen service. His step, his lithe shape, proclaimed him to be a rider. A sharp eye might have detected the bulge of a gun worn under his coat, high over his left hip and far back.

He had the look of a man who expected to see someone he knew. There was an easy, careless, yet guarded air about him. He walked down the platform, passing station men and others now moving about, without meeting anyone who took more than a casual glance at him.

At the end of the flagstone walk Rock hesitated and halted, as if surprised, even startled. Across the wide street stood a block of frame and brick buildings with high weatherbeaten signs. It was a lazy scene: a group of cowboys occupied the corner; saddle horses were hitched to a rail; buckboards and wagons showed farther down the street; Mexicans in colorful garb sat in front of a saloon with painted windows.

Memory stirred to the sight of the familiar corner. Rock had been in several bad gunfights in this town. The scene of one of them lay before him and a subtle change began to affect his pleasure in returning to Wagontongue. He left the station, giving a wide berth to the street corner that had clouded his happy reflections.

But he had not walked half a block before he came to another saloon, the familiar look of which and the barely decipherable name—Happy Days—acted like a blow in his face. He quickened his step, then, reacting to his characteristic spirit, he deliberately turned back to enter the saloon. The same place, the same bar, stained mirror

"I can introduce myself," struck in Rock and faded paintings, the same pool tables. Except for a barkeeper, the room was deserted. Rock asked for a drink.

"Stranger hereabouts, eh?" inquired the bartender.

"Yes; but I used to know Wagontongue," replied Rock. "How's the cattle business?"

"Good, off an' on. Of course it's slack now, but there's some trade in beef."

"Beef? You mean on the hoof?"

"No. Butcherin'. Gage Preston's outfit do a big business."

"Well, that's new," replied Rock, thoughtfully. "Gage Preston? . . . Heard his name somewhere."

Several booted men stamped in and lined up before the bar, and Rock went out.

HE FOUND his way to the Range House, a hotel on another corner. It had been redecorated, he noticed. He registered, gave the clerk his baggage checks and went to the room assigned him, where he further resisted the mood encroaching upon him by shaving and making himself look presentable to his exacting eyes.

"Sure would like to run into Amy Wund," he said, falling into reminiscence. "Or Polly Ackers. Or Kit Rand. All married long ago, I'll bet."

He went down-stairs to the lobby, where he encountered a heavy-set, ruddy-faced man, no other than Clark, the proprietor, whom he well remembered.

"Howdy, Rock. Glad to see you," greeted that worthy, cordially if not heartily, extending a hand. "I seen your name on the book. Couldn't be sure till I'd had a peep at you."

"Howdy, Bill," returned Rock, as they gripped hands.

"Wal, you haven't changed any, if I remember. Fact is, you look fit, an' prosperous, I may say. How long since you left Wagontongue?"

"Six years."

"Wal! So long as that? Time shore flies. We've growed some, Rock. A good many cattle men have come in. All the range pretty well stocked now. We have two lumber mills, some big stores, a school, an' a town hall."

"Well, you sure are comin' on. I'm right glad, Bill. Always liked Wagontongue."

coolly; "I'm Trueman Rock, late of Texas"

"Did you jest drop in to say hello to old friends, or do you aim to stay?" inquired Clark, his speculative eye lighting.

Rock mused over that query, while Clark studied him. After a moment, he flipped aside Rock's coat.

"Ahuh! Excuse me for bein' familiar. I see you're packin' hardware, as usual. But I hope you ain't lookin' for someone."

"Reckon not, Bill. But there might be someone lookin' for me. . . . How's my old friend Cass Seward?"

"Ha! . . . Wal, you needn't be curious aboot Cass lookin' for you. He's been daid these two years. He was a real sheriff, Rock, an' a good friend of yours."

"Well, I'm not so sure of that last; but Cass was a good fellow all right. Dead! I'm sure sorry. What ailed him, Bill?"

"Nothin'. He cashed with his boots on."

"Who killed him?"

"Wal, that was never cleared up for shore. It happened out here at Sandro. Cass got in a row, an' was shot. The talk has always been that Ash Preston killed Seward. But nobody, least of all our new sheriff, ever tried to prove it."

"Who's Ash Preston?"

"He's the oldest son of Gage Preston, a new cattle man to these parts since you rode here. An' Ash is as bad a hombre as ever forked a hoss. I ain't sayin' any more, an' please regard that as confidence."

"Certainly, Bill," replied Rock hastily. And after some casual conversation about the range they parted in the hotel lobby.

SITTING there in a chair Rock recalled friends and enemies of the old Wagontongue days. One of the best of the friends had been Sol Winter. Whenever Rock got into a scrape, provided it was not a shooting one, Sol was the one who helped him out of it. And as for money, Sol had always been his bank.

Rock, remembering many things—one of which was that he had left Wagontongue hastily and penniless—thought he recalled a debt still unpaid. With that he sallied out to find Winter's store.

It should have been a couple of blocks down the street. Some of the buildings were new, however, and Rock could not be sure.

Finally, he located the corner where Sol's place of business had been. A large and pretentious store now occupied this site. Rock experienced keen pleasure at the evidence of his old friend's prosperity. And he stalked gayly in, sure of a warm welcome. But he was only to learn that Sol Winter did not occupy this store.

Through inquiry, he located Winter's store at the end of the street. It was by no means a small or cheap place, but it was not what it had once been. Rock entered. Sol was waiting upon a woman. He looked older, thinner, grayer, and there were deep lines in his face that seemed strange to Rock. Six years was a long time Rock gazed around him. It was a large storeroom crowded with merchandise, hardware, groceries, saddles and harness and farm implements.

"Well, sir, what can I do for you?" inquired a voice at Rock's elbow. He turned to find Winter beside him.

"Howdy, Sol, old-timer," said Rock, with a warm leap of his pulse. "Don't you know me?"

Winter leaned and crouched a little, his eyes piercing. "True Rock!" he shouted, incredulously. "If it ain't really you! Why, you ole ridin', drinkin', shootin', lovemakin' son of a gun!"

"Glad to see me, Sol?" returned Rock, tingling under Winter's grip.

"Glad? Lordy, there ain't words to tell you! Why, True, you were always like my own boy. An' since I lost him—"

"Lost him! Who? You never had any boy but Nick. What you mean?"

"Didn't you ever hear aboot Nick? Nick was shot off his hoss out near Sunset Pass."

"Aw—no! Sol! That fine sweet lad! . . . My God, I'm sorry!" exclaimed Rock, huskily, as he wrung Winter's hands. "But it was an accident?"

"So they say; but I never believed it. There's still bad blood on the range, True. You must remember. In fact, there's some new bad blood come in since you left."

Here a customer entered, and Rock was left to himself for the moment. He seated himself on the counter and put aside his sombrero, to find his brow clammy and cold. Nick Winter dead! Shot by rustlers, probably, or some enemy of Winter's, or perhaps by this new bad element hinted at by Clark and Winter.

The last thing Rock would have expected was that anyone could do violence to gentle, kindly, crippled Nick Winter. Here was something to keep Rock around Wagontongue, if nothing else offered.

"True, it's good to see you sittin' there," said Winter, returning to place a hand on Rock's shoulder. "I never saw you look so well, so clean an' fine. I don't need to be told you've worked hard."

"Yes, Sol. I've been five years on a cattle job in Texas. Cleaned up ten thousand, all honest and square. I've got a roll that would choke a cow."

"No! Ten thousand? Why, True, that's a small fortune! It'll make you. If only you don't get drunk an' begin to gamble."

"Well, Sol, maybe I won't. But I've gone straight so long I'm worried. How much do I owe you?"

"Owe me? Nothin'," replied Sol, smiling.

"Look over your books, before I hand you one," ordered Rock fiercely. Whereupon, he helped Winter find the old account, which was not small, and forced him to accept payment with interest.

"Say, Rock, to be honest, this little windfall will help a lot," declared Winter. "I got in a cattle deal some time past, an' lost out pretty much in debt. Then the new store—Dabb's—ate into my trade. I had to move. Lately, though, my business has picked up. Old customers have come back. I think I can pull out."

"That's good. Who'd you go in cattle deals with?" rejoined Rock gruffly.

"Dabb."

"Dabb? Not John Dabb, who ran things here years ago! Sol, you ought to have known better."

"Sure. But it seemed such a promisin' deal, an' it was for Nick's sake. . . . But I'm out of cattle deals for good."

"Go on. Tell me some more bad news," said Rock gloomily. "What's become of my old girl, Kit Rand?"

"Kit? Let me see. I know she married Chess Watkins—"

"What! That drunken loafer?" interrupted Rock, indignantly.

"Yes; an' she couldn't change him, either. Kitty had to go to work in a restaurant here, an' finally they left Wagontongue. Never heard of them since."

"Kitty Rand? That dainty, clever little girl a waitress! Good lord! . . . How about Polly Ackers?"

"Polly went to the bad," returned Sol gravely. "Some flash gambler got around her. She's been gone for years."

Rock groaned. "I'm sorry I ever came back to this darned Wagontongue. . . . I'll risk one more question: How about my best girl, Amy Wund?"

"Worse an' more of it, True. After you left, Amy played fast an' loose with many a puncher. There are some who say yet that she never got over your runnin' away."

"Thunder! They're crazy!" burst out Rock. "She played fast an' loose with me. She never cared two snaps for me."

"Yes, she did; if there's anythin' in gossip. Mebbe she never found it out till you were gone. Amy was a high-strung lass. An' you know, Rock, you were sweet on Polly at the same time."

"Lord forgive me, I was." (Continued on page 197)

Do You Believe In Luck?

I Do

By Bruce Barton

ONE night last September I was alone in my home in New York, the family being still in the country. My pipe was out, and I had forgotten to relight it. The telephone rang, but I did not get up to answer it. Somebody pushed the front-door button, but I shall probably never know who the visitor was. For my chair was close against the radio, and I was wrapped up in one of the most thrilling stories that ever came to human ears—the broadcasting from Chicago of the Dempsey-Tunney fight.

I could see the contestants in the ring, under the arc lights, hundreds of miles away. I could hear the thump of their feet on the canvas, the clicking of the typewriters and the telegraph instruments, the deep, hoarse voices of the crowd. It seemed to me that I could catch the very breathing of the announcer. Certainly, I could hear him gasp when a solid blow was struck; and when Tunney went down in the seventh round the cry of the man at the microphone almost pulled me out of my chair.

"He's down! He's taking the count. Six, seven, eight, nine . . . He's up again. Dempsey is after him like a tiger. . . . He's sparring for time. . . . He's trying to get away. . . . Dempsey is driving in. . . . Oh, what a blow! . . ."

You will probably agree with me that as a job of reporting it was immense, for you undoubtedly were also one who listened. Whatever your views on prize-fighting, you did not miss the opportunity to share the emotions of that great crowd. You and your folks were on the edges of your chairs, just like the families in millions of homes, not only in America, but all over the world.

Let us go back a few years. There was a young chap who had come to New York and was trying to pay for a hall bedroom and three meals a day by singing in concerts, churches, cabarets, or wherever he could. He had a good voice; but New York is full of young men and women who have good voices. So the young chap had hard sledding. Sometimes he had his three meals, sometimes only two. When he was called for jury service he made no effort to avoid the summons—he was very glad to have the two or three dollars a day.

So it happened that he was spending two weeks down-town at the Criminal Courts Building on jury duty. When the court recessed for luncheon he strolled up Broadway and found himself in front of the telephone building. It occurred to him that this was the home of Station WEAF, and that he would like to see the inside of a broadcasting studio. Accordingly, he took the elevator, on a chance, not knowing whether or not a curious visitor would be admitted.

The people in charge of the studio were very courteous. They showed him the microphone and the electrical apparatus for sending out the waves, and when they found that he was a professional singer they asked him if he had ever been "on the air."

"Come on in here, and we'll give you a test," they said. "You might have a good broadcasting voice. Who knows?"

Nothing loath, the young man stood before the "mike" and talked and sang, while the studio managers listened in another room. His voice "came in fine," as they say in the business. They liked his manner and the pleasant way he had of putting personality into his tones. They told him that they needed an announcer and so, before he left the studio, he was hired.

Thus it came about that an obscure young singer happened to be at the ringside on that evening in last September, sending his voice into more millions of ears than have ever listened to any human voice before. The young man, as you know, is Graham McNamee. He is an international character. Unless something happens to spoil his career, he is likely to be as widely known as any man in the world. Millions of people who will never see him have a feeling of personal acquaintance, for they have sat by their own firesides and listened while he talked. . . . And all because he happened to be called for jury service that week, and walked up one side of Broadway instead of the other on his way back from lunch. And because it happened to occur to him that he was in front of the building where WEAF had its studio, and that he had always wanted to see how broadcasting was done.

HERE is another story with a different ending:

A manufacturer from upstate New York was in the office of his banker in Wall Street when the purchase of a certain automobile company was being discussed.

"That sounds like a good proposition. I have always hoped that I might some day be around this street when a deal was going through, and that you fellows would let me in on the ground floor."

"We'll let you in," the banker answered. "How much do you want to take?"

"Put me down for a hundred shares."

It was done. A few weeks later he received a bill for five thousand dollars and certificates for a hundred shares of preferred stock and a hundred shares of common stock as a bonus. He had been let in on the ground (Continued on page 156)

The Luckiest Thing That Ever Happened to Me

Prize Contest Announcement

IN THE remarkably interesting and significant article which begins on this page, Mr. Barton tells you why he believes in luck. What he says comes out of his own personal experience, and out of his observation. He has had some lucky breaks, and so have you. He relates his, and in this contest THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE invites you to describe, not all of your strokes of good fortune, but the one that stands out as the luckiest thing that ever happened to you. When did this greatest bit of luck befall you? What has it meant in your life?

For the best letter of not more than four hundred words we offer the following prizes: $30, first prize; $20, second prize; $10, third prize. Competition closes April 20th. Winning letters will appear in the July issue. Address Luck Contest Editor, THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE, 250 Park Avenue, New York City.

Contributions to this contest, and any enclosures, cannot be returned, so you must make a copy of your contest letter and of any enclosures, if you want to preserve them. Manuscripts and inquiries not connected with the contest must be sent under separate cover to the Editor of THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE.

MR. BARTON is now in the midst of two remarkable careers, one as an author, the other as a business man. He is president of Barton, Durstine & Osborn, a big New York advertising agency, and is the author of several widely read books and of innumerable magazine articles. Two of his most recent works, "The Man Nobody Knows," and "The Book Nobody Knows"—one on the life of Jesus, the other on the story of the Bible—were simultaneous best sellers. Mr. Barton was born in Robbins, Tennessee, in 1886, and is a graduate of Amherst. He has long been a favorite with readers of THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE, as his work has been appearing in its pages for many years. In the accompanying article he tells you what part luck has played in his life, and why his personal story happens to be what it is.

John Kane

JOHN KANE, sixty-year-old house painter of Pittsburgh, astonished the world of art last October when a painting of his on canvas was honored with a place in the International Exhibition of Paintings at Carnegie Institute. All of his life he had longed to be an artist, had dreamed dreams, and seen pictures everywhere; but dire poverty, lack of education, and lack of encouragement subordinated his artistic gifts to the daily struggle for existence. The photograph above shows Mr. Kane in his tenement "studio." The scene on the easel is not the one accorded a place in the Exhibition; the honored picture was of a Highland dance. Mr. Kane was born in Scotland.

"Maybe It's All I'll Ever Get, But It's Worth While"

So says John Kane about his one triumph as an artist, after a lifetime of dreams—Born to paint on canvas, he was forced to work as a miner, street laborer, house painter, and painter of box cars

By Mary B. Mullett

THE rain was pelting down furiously, as I stood in the doorway of a Pittsburgh hotel waiting for a taxi. When the next in line drew up at the curb, I gave the address to the driver and quickly got in. But, instead of starting, he turned and looked at me in surprise.

"What did you say?" he demanded.

I repeated the address, and added, "Do you know where it is?"

"Ye-es," he said dubiously. Then, with a puzzled shrug of his shoulders, he started the car.

It was about seven o'clock in the evening and pitch dark. After driving several blocks, we passed a railroad station and turned down a street running beside the tracks.

The pavement was full of holes. The buildings along the way were dark and the one sidewalk was deserted. But after half a mile or more of vicious jolting we came to a church on a corner; and just beyond it, over a dimly lighted vestibule, was the number I had given.

"What is this? The priest's house?" asked the driver.

"You know as much about it as I do!" I replied. "Will you wait a minute, while I investigate?"

"Sure!" he said. "This is no place for you to get stranded; and on a night like this."

When I had climbed the steps and passed through the vestibule, I found myself in a big, square hall from which a wide central stairway led to the upper stories.

It was one of those houses which evidently have seen better days; but they must have long since departed, for it was dingy and forbidding now, although it was scrupulously clean.

Choosing at random one of the great high doors facing the hall, I knocked; and a moment later, the door opened a crack and a small boy peered out at me.

"Does John Kane live here?" I asked.

"In the room on that corner," he said, pointing upward.

So I dismissed the friendly driver and mounted the wide stairs. I learned, later, that the house had once been a school conducted by a Catholic sisterhood. But people had moved away from that part of the city, and the dignified old building had become only a tenement.

As I waited in the upper hall for my knock to be answered, I heard a curious rustling sound from behind the closed door. This was explained when the door opened, for the entire floor of the room within was spread with newspapers.

Standing on this improvised carpet, was a tall man in working clothes; a shirt of gray flannel, but clean; and trousers so worn with use that the knees shone as if they had been polished.

His face, too, was worn and lined, almost haggard. There were deep hollows around the dark eyes. And in those eyes there was a look which I cannot describe in a few words, any more than I could put the history of a whole life into a single sentence.

For that matter, John Kane's eyes tell the story of his life better than I can tell it. But since you cannot read it in his face, I'll have to do the best I can with words.

But I'm not going to begin at the beginning. I am going to start with the chapter which was reached only last October.

That date may mean nothing to you. In Pittsburgh, however, it was decidedly important, for it marked the opening, at Carnegie Institute, of the Twenty-Sixth International Exhibition of Paintings. In fact, it was important throughout the whole world of art, in Europe as well as in America.

BUT to John Kane it was more important than to anyone else, for to him it brought the supreme moment of his life. A moment which seemed to justify years of struggle, and which brought the first break in a long succession of disappointments, the first ray of hope to brighten discouragement.

Perhaps he was more surprised than anyone else, when the jury admitted one of his pictures to the International Exhibition. Those eyes of his are not blind! Or, rather, the brain behind them is not blind. When it comes to painting, the one thing he is sure of is that he knows very little about painting.

At any rate, about painting pictures. With houses it is different! He knows he is a good house painter. Freight cars, too! He painted freight cars for years.

"That was easy," he says, "for a man with an eye for color and a knack at handling brushes."

But pictures! . . . Well, if you'd never had an hour's teaching, never even known anyone who could paint a picture, but had just groped your way alone, you wouldn't feel very sure of yourself.

Not unless you were blinded by self-confidence—which John Kane is not. One can see that, in the sagging of his powerful shoulders, in the low and hesitant voice, and in the dark eyes, with the half-eager, half-patient look which it actually hurts you to see.

NO! JUST because one of his pictures was finally hung in an exhibition, John Kane doesn't think that he is a great painter. His head—the hair turning gray after sixty years of the struggle to live—isn't turned by this first success.

The most that one can say is that it has given him the courage to go on groping his way toward a dream. Whether the dream ever will be realized has nothing to do with this story. Possibly, or probably, or even surely, as many people think, it will remain always a dream.

There must have been several dozen pictures in the room where John Kane lives alone. That there might be more space for them to lean against the wall, the iron bed, with its thin mattress, stood out in the middle of the floor. Near it was an easel; and beside this a rude palette and a box of paints.

I had guessed, at first, that the newspaper "carpet" was to protect the floor from mud "tracked in" from the street. But I revised this idea: It was to keep the floor free from the stains of oil and paint.

Of all the pictures already there, and of those to be added later, perhaps not one will ever be (Continued on page 142)

Colonel Braxton Chooses But Refuses

A Story By

Melville Davisson Post

Illustrated by W. H. D. Koerner

Colonel Braxton took up the hatchet and stepped before the closet

THE "Eldorado" of New Orleans was the worst boat. It had an evil reputation on the Ohio. The reputation, in more than one conspicuous way, was earned.

The owner was a convict, it was said, and the crew were drunken. They were recruited from the levees of New Orleans and the discarded scum of that port. "A nest of hell birds" was the usual designation of the "Eldorado."

There was always a river war. The crew would land, commit some depredation, and go on.

But the criminal agents could not be sworn to. One could show that they had landed from the river. But the river was the border highway of Virginia.

All traveled on that highway.

The individual, careful to set up his alibi, could not be singled out as the precise agent in any particular depredation. Moreover, the loot lifted in these night raids could not be followed. It was hidden away, to be disposed of covertly in New Orleans—more than two thousand miles to the south in a world seaport of the Gulf.

It will be seen, then, how articles taken in such pillage were considered lost.

It is necessary to keep this fact in mind if one is to understand the strange events that are to follow.

ON a morning of early April, Colonel Braxton, on the way to his office, was called into the local bank. When he entered, Mr. Luther Harrison, the cashier, asked him to step up to his window, through which he pushed five gold pieces.

"I have been directed to hand you this money, Colonel," he said, "and to request you to come at once to Elmwood Court."

"For what purpose, Harrison?" inquired the lawyer.

"Now that," replied the banker, "I cannot tell you. But I presume it is on some professional service. I know little more than you know. A negro appeared this morning with the money and the message. He said that he came from Ridgewood Carter, and that you were to come to Elmwood Court. He seemed in a great flurry of some sort, and at once went out."

"Ridgewood Carter," echoed Colonel Braxton. "He is known to your bank, then?"

"I could hardly say known to us. He was in here on one occasion with his aged sister, some years ago, when she came North to find a residence. The old lady was arranging with our bank to meet the expenses of a niece in Miss Tucker's school, at Stanton; a monthly transfer of some funds. But the man would be known, Colonel, both by his facial resemblance to his sister and by the fact that he is lame—wounded in the Mexican War, I think his sister said."

He added: "I have heard nothing from the man. I received the message only because it was addressed to you. I assumed that it would be a matter you understood."

Colonel Braxton held the money a moment in his hand.

"This will be, then, the brother who inherits Elmwood. Old Martha Carter must be dead. Northcote wrote her will, and, now that I recall it, there was a brother somewhere about the world, to whom the manor house and lands were to pass. He was named, but there was nothing more about him. It was all a rather strange piece of business. Northcote had consulted privately with me and because of certain knowledge in my possession, I had advised against the purchase when the ancient woman acquired this property. But this brother's succession to the estate must have come quickly. The old woman can be hardly in her grave."

"At any rate," said Harrison, "she was not disturbed in her life."

"But in her death," replied Colonel Braxton, "this brother may be disturbed; and if that should be his need for me then it will be of no use to go. I know the facts in the case. No one can help him."

Mr. Harrison stepped about behind the wire screen of his counter.

"Well," he said, "I hope the young girl at Miss Tucker's school at Stanton will not be disturbed. We came to know something of her through these remittances. She is quite helpless in the world; her parents dead, her fortune squandered; dependent in every way upon this remittance from her aunt. And this remittance ceases at the woman's death. . . . Would there be, sir, a provision in the will to care for this dependent orphan?"

Colonel Braxton continued to balance the gold pieces in his hand. The details of a past matter seemed to recur to him.

"There was a girl in this affair—a niece, Miss Sarah Carrington. This lost brother was not the only legatee. There was a bequest to Miss Sarah Carrington, a rather queer bequest . . . a sort of hidden estate, one might say. But not an indefinite estate. There was an inventory, in the old lady's hand, attached to the legal testament. This inventory was quite definite in setting out the items."

"That would be the girl," replied Harrison. "And it explains a thing I saw this morning. On my way here, I passed a carriage containing your brother of the bar, Mr. Orlandus Wood, and a young girl. They were driving out on the old turnpike toward Elmwood on the river."

THERE was something in this incident that decided Colonel Braxton.

He put the gold pieces into his pocket and went out. He got a carriage with a negro driver. It was an April morning out of Paradise, with a soft air and a radiant sun. The sort of morning that follows a night of storm, as though to encourage the race of men that, in the violence of nature, the providence of God has not deserted them.

The storm preceding this sunny morning had indeed been violent—thunder, lightning and rain. The sort of tropical disturbance that comes sometimes in Virginia in the early spring. But there was no longer visible evidence of it, except the wet earth, for it had been a storm of sound and rain with no breath of wind about it.

The highway ran along the elevated lands about the river.

The river lay bright and golden in the sun, with hardly a ripple on its yellow surface. There was no floating craft to be seen. Colonel Braxton marked this, and spoke to the negro driver.

"Clayborn," he said, "what became of the 'Eldorado'? It should have arrived last night on its way down to New Orleans."

"She done gone on, Colonel. She come in last night, but she don't stop. She gone on. I guess she feared to stop. The sheriff done served notice on them rabscallions what he do if they stop."

And the chuckle deepened. The ancient negro visioned to himself, with joy, the swift and violent measure with which a Virginia sheriff would enforce his threat against a river boat.

Elmwood lay a few miles below the city. A private road turned out from the highway, passed through a piece of woodland, and came into the grounds before the door.

It was an old Georgian house of crumbling red brick. The entrance door, in its decoration of Georgian architecture, faced directly east. One entered a narrow hall with a stair going up to the left, and with a door off to the right into the service portion of the house. One went from this hall into the one large room of the house, an old-time parlor.

With a care to proper furnishings this room would have been beautiful and impressive.

But it was cluttered with the odd accumulation of family pieces of various periods, and was in indifferent repair. The wood fireplace was in the center of the wall at the south end of this room, with an enclosed cupboard on each side extending from the chimney to the wall.

The room to the west, on the river side, opened on a terrace of old brick, with a view of the sloping lawn to the water. Two doors, long and narrow and fitted with small panes of glass, opened on this terrace.

Colonel Braxton had now a new and urgent interest in this affair, and he considered

Near the door was a secretary, its folded desk-board down, and on it some writing materials: sheets of foolscap, pens newly purchased, and a pot of ink. These articles were laid out as for use.

There were three persons in this ancient room when Colonel Braxton entered: The attorney, Mr. Orlandus Wood; his client, Miss Sarah Carrington; and another—an old man sitting before this secretary. An inscrutable old man with a seamed, sun-tanned face. But behind the evidences of wind and weather, the face in its expression was a mask. It was a face emerging from varied fortunes and concealing the issue of those fortunes, like a door closed and bolted. And on the instant when he marked the man, Colonel Braxton had that disturbing impression that comes sometimes in a dream—the impression of familiarity with that face.

Somewhere, on some occasion, he had seen it.

The old man rose as Colonel Braxton came into the room. He made a stiff and somewhat obsequious genuflexion, for his right leg seemed shorter than the left. There could be no doubt that he was the brother of Miss Martha Carter. The family resemblance in the face, as Harrison had said, was marked.

"It is Colonel Braxton?" he said, as though in his mind he cast about for formal language. "I have not had the honor of your acquaintance. But I have taken the liberty to ask you to come in here. Your reputation, sir, reaching throughout the South, has also reached to me."

Colonel Braxton replied with formal courtesy.

He was intrigued and puzzled.

Here was some mysterious transaction moving toward the light.

He spoke to the attorney and to his client.

THE girl sat primly on a big haircloth sofa. She was a daughter of the South in her golden youth; quite young and all in black except for the little bands of white at her throat and wrists. There was about her the trust and embarrassment of youth; that fairy idea of the world—false and dangerous—with which the cultured home, so impractically, equips its children.

And when the protection of the birth-roof fails, these innocents are slaughtered. They have no experience to protect them against the realities of life.

It saddened Colonel Braxton's heart.

How many times he had met with this! And, alas, usually too late!

The widow, trusting to her husband's associates in business, was picked bare; the child, going to its father's friends, was looted. And yet sometimes mysteriously the providence of God thrust in its hand!

Colonel Braxton looked about the room.

The violences of the thing that had occurred were open to the eye. There was no need for Mr. Ridgewood Carter to indicate them with a gesture.

The doors leading in from the terrace had been broken open. Mud-smeared feet had tracked up the floors. The closet on the east side of the fireplace at the end of the long room had been cut open as with an ax. The implement lay there on the floor, a heavy hatchet, new and sharp, with a short handle; a tool manufactured at

When You Feel Yourself Coming Down With A Cold

By William S. Sadler, M. D.

DRAWINGS BY PAUL CARRUTH

HOW do you treat colds, Doctor?" a patient asked me the other day. I was tempted to give her the reply of the old-time doctor: "With contempt, madam, with contempt." However, on second thought, I decided I had better explain to her our more recent concept of colds, and how the treatment varies in accordance with their classification. Some years ago when, as a young doctor, I was in attendance at the clinic of a famous physician, I remember he spent some time discussing a patient who was apparently coming down with a severe cold in the head.

The physician had turned his back to leave, when a student in the amphitheatre piped up: "But what are you going to give the patient?" The clinician turned about, looked quizzical for a moment, stroked his chin, and replied: "Well, about ten days, I guess."

Here we have two methods of treating a cold—with contempt and with time. The second method is certainly superior to the first, for a minimum of harm would be done if patients with colds, especially if attended by fever, would just take a rest for a week or ten days. In fact, when a cold has become well established, I doubt if there is any method of treatment that can do much to shorten the course of the affliction.

I have been studying colds for twenty-five years, and more recently I have come to the conclusion that there are at least six different aspects of the affliction which goes by the common name of "cold."

While there are certain general lines of treatment that are more or less adapted to all colds, nevertheless, each group, owing to its different cause, is best managed by treatment directed more specifically to correcting those remote and immediate conditions which are actually responsible for that particular kind of cold.

Let me first give you my classification of colds, and then I will take them up one by one and discuss the treatment I have found best for these different groups:

1. Colds with fever—constitutional or the "flu" type of colds.
2. Colds without fever—the annual type, or the acute infectious type of colds.
3. Recurrent colds—colds resulting from sinus or other chronic nose and throat infections, the catarrhal type of colds.

These first three types of colds represent the contagious group. They are undoubtedly caused by some form of living organism, probably one that is too small to be seen by our present-day microscopes.

4. Deficiency colds—the coryza type of colds, resulting from calcium deficiency or diminished alkali reserve of the blood, acidosis.
5. Irritation colds—colds resulting from dust, diminution of the nasal secretions, or lack of humidity.
6. Hay-fever colds—summer colds, so-called rose-fever colds.

These last three types of colds are non-contagious. If any living organism is concerned in their production, such organism must play a secondary rôle.

Perhaps we should also include a seventh group, which might be called combination colds. We certainly do see colds in which there is a combination of either No. 1 or No. 2 with the more chronic catarrhal form of No. 3. We can have colds which are a combination of No. 2 and No. 4, or No. 2 and No. 5, and we may even have a combination of the hay-fever type of cold with some other type. It is these combined types of colds that present the greatest difficulty in working out a satisfactory and effective plan of treatment.

Of all the common minor maladies afflicting us mortals probably none are more troublesome or more completely misunderstood than colds.

The time has come when colds should not be treated "with contempt," especially when they manifest a tendency to hang on. Neglected colds may predispose certain susceptible individuals to bronchitis and pneumonia, if not tuberculosis, and lay the foundation for other constitutional disorders.

THE average person, when coming down with a severe cold, is taken rather suddenly with sneezing and chilliness, which may or may not be followed by a state of general fever. The majority of our colds are without fever. Now, this is the same group of symptoms that accompanies the onset of many infectious diseases, such as diphtheria, scarlet fever, whooping cough, measles, pneumonia, and influenza. This is why it would be an excellent idea to isolate for two or three days all school children showing symptoms of a fresh cold, in order to find out if they are affected merely with a cold or if they are coming down with one of the other contagious diseases.

I'm often asked "Why do people take cold?" That's a difficult question to answer specifically. Some folks succumb to infectious colds through over-eating, particularly when they eat an excess of proteins and other acid ash-forming foods, such as cereals. Constipation is another contributing factor. Under- or over-dressing, drafts and undue exposure, and lack of physical exercise also predispose to colds.

Certain individuals are almost sure to have a cold if they get their feet wet, but I doubt sometimes if this is a true infectious cold. I think that colds resulting from wet feet more often belong to one of the non-infectious types.

The first thing to do when coming down with an infectious cold is to clean out the digestive tract thoroughly by taking a cathartic or an enema. Then take a hot bath and go to bed with a hot-water bottle to the feet. Drink an abundance of liquid—hot water or hot lemonade—and leave the rest to nature. One thing, however, is of special importance: be careful not to get chilled after taking a hot bath.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

The diet should be light, consisting mostly of fruits, vegetables, toast, and milk. Avoid too much meat and the more hearty foods.

Exercise is sometimes good in the early stages of a cold, but do not indulge in it if you have a fever. A fever calls for bed and the doctor.

Nose sprays and throat gargles are helpful if used when you are coming down with a cold, but they haven't much effect after you are in its clutches.

ONE: Treatment of colds accompanied by fever: Colds accompanied by fever should be taken seriously. One thing is imperative: you must go to bed and stay there until the temperature has been normal at least twenty-four hours, or until your doctor has given you permission to be up and about your business.

In these more general and constitutional types of colds it is doubly important that the bowel tract should be thoroughly cleansed; that the diet should be light, and that plenty of water should be taken. It is also a good thing, in these cases with fever to give at the beginning two- or three-teaspoonful doses of baking soda The soda can be stirred up in two thirds of a glass of lemonade or orangeade, and is valuable in decreasing the acidity in the blood.

If you have had a real siege of the flu, if you have had a cold with fever, about a month after you have recovered send a specimen of urine to your doctor to find out how the kidneys are. Flu and fever have a tendency to leave the kidneys in a weakened condition.

The important thing when you have a cold with fever is to keep your skin warm, thereby helping to avoid such complications as bronchitis and pneumonia. I do not mean that you should be kept over-warm to the point of sweating; neither should the atmosphere of the sick chamber be over-heated. It is possible to have an abundance of fresh air in the sick-room and yet, by means of hot-water bottles to the feet and suitable covering, to keep the skin warm. Be sure to have the arms covered with a bed jacket if you are propped up in bed. By keeping the skin thoroughly warm congestion of the internal organs is prevented.

A FEVERISH cold is often accompanied by headaches and severe pains in various parts of the body, particularly in the spine, in which case aspirin or other forms of salicylate should be taken, under the direction of the doctor.

One of the most valuable treatments that can be administered for colds of this sort is the hot full bath. The temperature should be somewhere between 105° to 110° F.—and may be continued anywhere from three to ten minutes, according to the strength and comfort of the patient. Throughout this bath, an ice-cold moist cloth should be kept on the head. I suggest a towel wrung out to the point where it will not drip, and wrapped around the forehead, back of the head, and overlapped on the top of the head. In this way all the advantages of a hot bath will be secured, while the disadvantage of over-heating the head will be avoided. Those who administer such a treatment to one suffering from a flu cold should have ready warm sheets and blankets in which to wrap up the patient the moment he emerges from the bath, and they should see to it that he is quickly and thoroughly dried, and then so expertly manage this proceeding that the patient will not break out in secondary perspiration nor be subject to chilling in getting from the bathroom back into bed. Before taking such a hot bath, it is a good plan to clean out the bowels by means of a warm soapsuds enema.

TWO: Treatment of colds without fever—the annual or acute infections: These are the colds that tend to "run through families." They are spread largely by common drinking glasses, towels, handkerchiefs, and carelessness concerning the nasal toilet.

It is true, every now and then, that some member of a large family will fail to take this autumnal or winter cold. I recently saw a case where one of the children in a family of nine came home from school with a cold. In a few days all were infected except one boy, twelve years of age. He often escapes a cold that otherwise goes through the family. It is very difficult to account for this peculiar immunity to colds, but we see it every now and then.

The first thing to do when you feel you are coming down with a cold of this sort is to make early use of gargles and antiseptic oils in the nose and throat. I believe such treatment, in connection with other measures, has power to stop a cold if resorted to promptly. As in the case of colds with fever, cleanse the bowel tract, take a hot bath, use a few teaspoonfuls of soda, drink an abundance of liquids, and eat fairly lightly for a day or two.

The method of treatment which is most effective in applying antiseptics to the nose and throat is to lie down on the back, and with a medicine dropper drop two or three dropperfuls of some oily antiseptic into the nose and let it run back into the post-nasal passages and on down into the throat. You can do this every ten or fifteen minutes for a few hours during the onset of your cold. In this stage, the irrigation of the nose and throat with lukewarm normal salt solution—a teaspoonful of salt to a pint of water—is also effective. This salt water should never be snuffed up the nose, but gently drawn into the nose and allowed to run out through the mouth. In snuffing it up there is danger of infecting the ears through the Eustachian tubes.

You can secure an excellent throat gargle by simply asking at your drugstore for the official "Dobell's solution." Another excellent gargle is the following:

Sodium bicarbonate	½ drachm
Sodium biborate	½ drachm
Sodium benzoate	1 grain
Eucalyptol	⅔ drop
Menthol	⅓ grain
Distilled water	8 ounces

Behind The Mike

By Graham McNamee

PHOTOGRAPH BY D. JAY CULVER

Graham McNamee, wearing a hat given to him by a Texas friend

ON MY way home from California recently, I went into the dining-car for breakfast. I glanced over the menu, looked up and gave the waiter my order. As I spoke to him I saw a puzzled look come into his eyes. His ears seemed to open up a little with that familiar movement which characterizes a person who is listening very intently. He went away and in a moment came back to ask me to repeat the order. Then I saw his white teeth spread out through his dusky countenance in a great smile.

"Ain't you Mr. McNamee?" he asked.

I confessed to the soft impeachment.

"I thought I knowed your voice when you gim'me your order. I tole 'em so back in the kitchen. Another waiter looked you over and said he was sure I was wrong, because he was sure that Mr. McNamee must be a very much bigger man. He said you was big and fat. One of the other waiters seen your picture somewhere, and he agreed with me. We had a big argument 'bout it an' so we made a bet. I bet you was you and they bet you wasn't you. Tha's why I asked you—to settle that bet."

I tell this little story to illustrate the extent to which radio has become a part of the life and habits of our people. I realize that so far as I am concerned, I am only a voice—a voice crying not in the wilderness but in the ether. It is only five years ago that I got my first radio job, and was tickled to death at my good fortune. Now that tremendous machine, radio, has come to be so well known and generally accepted that, no matter where I go, a taxicab driver in a Texas town, a dining-car porter in California, a hotel bell-boy in Chicago will be almost certain to recognize my voice immediately—merely because I am a part of that machine.

IT IS only a few years ago that the DX fans—the youngsters listening for distant stations—would sit up at night and jump with delight when in New York City they could get Florida. Now this is so common that one man in New York, another in Chicago, and another in California will actually take part in the same program. I have had innumerable letters asking for an explanation of how we conduct these great programs, with the performers stationed in widely separated cities.

As this is one of the newest developments in broadcasting, perhaps I can begin with an account of the greatest effort yet made in famous programs of this type. I refer to the recent one over which Will Rogers presided from his home in Beverly Hills. That was a veritable six-ring circus, with each ring in a different part of the country, the announcer, Phil Carlin, in New York and the ring master, Will Rogers, in California. Fred Stone and his daughter Dorothy sang and danced in Chicago, Al Jolson sang from his hotel in New Orleans, and Mr. Wilmer talked from his library in Detroit.

The performance was broadcast by about sixty stations located practically all over this continent. I dare say some thirty million people were listening in. Will Rogers, standing in his study in Beverly Hills, introduced as the next number on the program, Mr. Fred Stone, in Chicago, and, without a moment's pause, Mr. Stone's voice flowed into the air upon his cue, two thousand miles away. The whole performance was collected mysteriously out there in the air and fed through your loud speaker into your sitting-room.

I have said there were sixty stations in that "hook-up." Here is the way stations are hooked up: Let us suppose a concert is to be broadcast by two stations simultaneously—WEAF, of New York, and WRC, of Washington. The artists are all in the studio of WEAF, in New York. When they begin broadcasting, two things happen: The program goes through the antennæ of WEAF out over the air. It goes at the same time through a long-distance telephone wire to the studio of WRC and through its amplifier and antennæ into the air to its listeners.

The performance is taking place only in New York, but the audiences of both WEAF and WRC are getting it. Those two stations are thus "hooked up." Now it is possible to hook up a third station in the same way and, indeed, as many stations as there are in existence.

Now, when this happens, the air becomes a gigantic reservoir, which you can tap anywhere and get that concert. But you can also feed portions of that concert in at any point. That is just what we did on that night when sixty stations were hooked up. The broadcasting would go on at WEAF for a few minutes. Then WEAF would cease and another station in the hook-up would begin.

BUT of course this is only part of the story. When a concert like this is under way there must be communication between the stations taking part in the broadcasting, so that they can talk to each other without being heard by the radio audience. All the performers are at the respective stations, separated by many miles. But something may go wrong with an artist, or a bit of mechanism. It is necessary that the directors at the several stations be able to speak with each other. And so this immense span of territory between California and New York and Louisiana and Illinois and Michigan must be hooked up in a second, a telephone circuit, as well. When such a great program is in progress we have two parallel circuits.

When that concert began the New York announcer made his little talk, and then said the program would be turned over to Will Rogers "out in Beverly Hills." That name Beverly Hills was Will Rogers's cue to begin. I was sitting with him in his library looking after the ordinary details. When he finished, and introduced Fred Stone he said the next voice will be that of Fred Stone "in Chicago." The word Chicago was Stone's cue. Thus, it had been arranged beforehand that the names of the cities where the performers were located were to be their cues, and no one was to use the name of any such city for any other purpose, and thus the air was swept clean for the cues.

"BEHIND the Mike" is the first of many articles to be written for THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE by Graham McNamee, the most famous radio announcer in the world. He tells you how stations are "hooked up," and gives you an intimate account of what goes on behind the scenes. In his second article, which will appear next month, and in those to follow, he will continue to give you the inside story of his experiences, and the experiences of others who go on the air.

And now for an explanation of that "Please stand by" signal. For that is what it is—a signal—a cue. As every one knows, people all over are constantly tuning in and tuning out. When a man waggles the dial of his radio and hears a concert coming over, he wants to know what it is, who is giving it, and where it is coming from, and what it is all about. He wasn't around when the program started. He didn't hear the initial introductions. And he gets very much annoyed if the concert doesn't halt occasionally so that he can find out what he is getting.

In a concert like the one I have been describing, as soon as the moment for an announcement arrives, you hear the voice of the announcer in New York proclaim: "Please stand by for your local announcer." As soon as the last syllable dies, sixty local announcers in sixty stations all over the continent step to their microphones to identify their stations and the program. The next time you hear that signal take out your watch. You will see that just fifteen seconds are allowed these local men to get in their work—not a second more or less: The man in New York, who cannot hear these voices, holds his watch, and at the end of fifteen seconds, he starts the concert again. He knows the local men are through. That rule is binding.

Now, all these things are the parts of the concert that you hear in your city sitting-room or out in your farm dining-room or kitchen.

There is another job going on all this time that you never hear and, indeed never hear about or perhaps even think about. It is the part being played by all the innumerable operators and assistants, linemen, switchmen, tone experts, radio experts, moving and managing the show behind the scenes.

On the night of the great show I have been telling you about there were no fewer than two thousand men working on that vast circuit. Some of them, of course, were just there as experts to assist in tone adjustments. But many sat at vital points in the circuit. They are like the fuses in your home electric installation. If any one of them had blown out, the wise and witty cracks of Will Rogers and the songs of Mr. Jolson in New Orleans would have faded from the air, and in thousands of homes thousands of irate radio fans would have been twisting their dials frantically, rattling their loud speakers, ringing us up from everywhere, pouring in on us through the telephone like a great indignant mob. And all because one unknown man had nodded at his switch.

But they didn't nod. They are perfect examples of that unobserved function which so many men perform outside the spotlight, never sharing in the applause, never getting any sort of mention, yet sticking to their jobs with a loyalty, and, in the case of radio particularly, an enthusiastic intelligence that is amazing. How many times when broadcasting a football game have I seen a player grab the ball and run, almost as through an open, unobstructed avenue, for a long gain or a goal. I cry into the mike that Brown has the ball, "He just walks right through that line. It just seems to melt away before him." And the crowd cheers Brown and the next day his picture is in the paper, and he is carried on the shoulders of his joy-crazed collegians.

What the crowd doesn't see and perhaps never hears of is the dauntless dash of some other player who bumps the defense out of Brown's way, and who is the real explanation of why that mighty line seems to melt away. The unsung players behind the scenes, behind the lines, and, in radio, as everywhere else, behind the mikes!

I MUST tell here about a new development in radio, a development on its artistic side. It has to do with the newest thing in radio studios, the new and beautiful model studio of the National Broadcasting Company in New York.

As most radio fans will understand, performances are practically of two sorts: those which are broadcast from a theatre or public hall, where the radio taps in on a public performance, and those which are staged especially for the radio in a broadcasting studio. Each has its advantages and disadvantages. In a studio concert, it is possible to get all the mechanical adjustments more perfectly made, to shut out all alien sounds more perfectly, and to get the microphones placed at the proper distances. This is not easy in a hall, particularly with some performers. Their style calls for action, movement about and, hence, reception at the other end, at the loud speaker, is uneven.

PERHAPS you noted when President Cosgrave of Ireland spoke over the radio from Chicago during his recent visit, how his voice would fade away and then grow vigorous again. That is characteristic of Europeans who have not adapted themselves to the broadcasting technique. They weave about and sway their bodies up and down, with a consequent loss of tone.

A few nights later President Coolidge spoke at the budget meeting in Washington. I wonder if listeners noticed the difference—how his voice came over in a perfectly even flow all the time, and never a syllable or tone being lost—because the President is a very calm, deliberate man, and stands at the proper distance from the mike, literally "keeps his distance" as it were; because he has very great respect for it, and for the simple reason that he realizes it is carrying his message to millions of people.

But the public appearance has this (Continued on page 187)

"The whole secret of getting along with parents is never to let them guess how little they know"

Sauce for the Goose

A Dot and Will story

By Fannie Kilbourne

ILLUSTRATED BY T. K. HANNA

I thought I heard Cousin Effie's voice, but I was so used to looking for that old gray cravenette coat and gray feather hat that at first I didn't recognize her

WILL and I had often congratulated ourselves on being practically free of the in-law proposition. Of course my family would never have been a problem to anybody, because Mother is so sweet, and Father is awfully broad-minded, and everybody likes my sister, Kathie, who is married, and living in Minneapolis, anyway. Of course, with Will's family, it is a little different. I don't want to pin any orchid on my own shoulder, but it's only fair to admit that there are girls who wouldn't have got along with Mother and Father Horton anything like the way I have.

The whole secret of getting along with parents is never to let them guess how little they know.

That's the way I have worked it. Mother Horton, for instance, is very proud of her figure, and I could easily make her dislike me by telling her that the waist line went out with the patent rocker, and that people who have a figure these days take as many pains to conceal it as they would a jail record in the family. Also, she thinks she knows all about bringing up children, just because Will turned out all right. The truth of it is, it's a wonder that he even lived! It was the merest combination of good luck and the fact that he had a strong constitution. But do I tell Mother Horton that? I do not. Not even when she makes fun of my bringing up the twins according to modern methods.

"My stars!" she'll say, "I expect to come here some day and find Dot boiling up the baby book and putting it through the sieve to feed it to the babies. That's about the only thing she hasn't tried to do with it already."

And never once since we've been married have she and Father Horton come to our house for supper in the winter that he hasn't gone through the same performance: I'll have the living-room lights fixed just to suit me, the bridge lamp on in the corner by the radio, one bulb in the table light loosened, to keep it from being glary, and the piano lamp with the violet shade on in the other corner. Those three together give a lovely, soft, romantic effect.

BUT not to Father Horton. Every single time, he'll blink around and say, "What's the idea? Getting ready for a séance? Let's have a little light on the subject."

Whereupon, he'll switch on the glaring, three-bulb overhead light, which makes any room look about as romantic as a dairy lunch. But do I tell him that the trouble is that his artistic taste hasn't been educated up to violet light? I do not. I just laugh, and act as though the only reason I hadn't put on the overhead, myself, was because I didn't have brains enough to push the button.

Most of the young married couples we know have some sort of in-law difficulties, on one side or the other. Scott simply can't stand Corinne's sister's husband, and Bob and Ruth have to support Bob's old uncle, who criticizes everything Ruth does, from bobbing her hair to being a Christian Scientist.

In fact, as Will and I looked about at our friends, we thought we were pretty lucky. And I guess we have been, at that.

Even in spite of Cousin Effie.

Cousin Effie is Mother Horton's cousin, Will's second cousin. Mother Horton always looked out for her. She used to be at their home quite a little, all the time Will was growing up. She was an old maid and a quarter invalid—not quite as much as a semi-invalid—and poor. She owned the cottage that she lived in on Oak Street and had a tiny little income besides; but above that, Father Horton supported her.

When Father Horton began talking about pulling out of the business and going to Los Angeles, for winters at least, Mother Horton was worried. She said she didn't see how she could leave Effie. Will was quite worried about his father—every winter in Montrose he gets one of those terrible bronchial coughs that just pull him down to nothing—and Will said that if they wanted to try Los Angeles not to be held back by Cousin Effie. We would look out for Cousin Effie.

I said so, too, of course. After all, if Father Horton pulled out of the business it would all be Will's, and it did seem as though, having all that done for us, the least we could do would be to take on Cousin Effie, especially as it wasn't such an awful lot that Father Horton paid her.

I must give myself credit for one thing—that when I undertake to do a thing I do my best to do it thoroughly. I knew that Cousin Effie used to be at the Hortons' quite often for meals, and the very first Sunday after they'd gone I invited her for dinner.

I FIGURED out just as nice a dinner, too, as though I were having regular company. Roast chicken with all the fixings and lemon meringue pie. I put on my rose crêpe dress too. And I followed out my regular rule for dealing with in-laws. When she told Will to give her a very small piece of the chicken, because chicken always gave her dyspepsia, the natural thing for me would have been to say:

"Oh, chicken can't possibly hurt you, Cousin Effie. It's one of the easiest digested foods there is. I gave it to the babies when they weren't quite two years old, and it's the first meat they give you in a hospital."

But I didn't say this. I didn't even tell her that dyspepsia had gone out. I shouldn't think anybody'd want to have dyspepsia nowadays, any more than they'd want to wear a bustle; but I didn't say so. It is a bit disheartening, though, to see a nice dinner be a perfect flop. She wouldn't touch the lemon pie either.

"I can't eat anything acid," she said. "I break out."

Will usually dries the dishes for me Sundays; but Cousin Effie offered to. Will strolled over next door to talk to Roger Lane. It was a lovely fall day, and after we got the dishes done, Cousin Effie and I sat out on the porch. Before the afternoon was over, I made up my mind that, while I was only too glad to have

I don't believe Cousin Effie had had a compliment in years. She got all red and pleased, like a girl that's just had a boy friend bring her her first box of candy

Will give her a check every month, and while I would, of course, take care of her if she were sick, I really couldn't have her for dinner once or twice a week, the way the Hortons had always done. I never knew such a tiresome, depressing human being to talk to.

All she could talk about was her poor health and her troubles. For anyone who was interested in sickness it would have been a real opportunity to learn a lot; but, while I'm very sympathetic when a person is sick, I can't say I'm much interested in hearing them talk about it when they're not.

"Yes," Cousin Effie said, "I'm really feeling fine to-day, and that always worries me. I never feel as well as this except just before an attack."

Then she told me all about the attacks she had had during the past year. The twins were playing out on the lawn, and they were so cute that even I, who certainly have every chance to get tired of them, had to laugh to see them. They were pretending that they were going marketing, and with their funny baby talk and funny little grown-up way, I couldn't keep my eyes off them. But Cousin Effie didn't even see them. She was too busy talking about how nobody ever came to see her any more.

"Mercy, I can see why nobody does," I told Will that evening after she'd gone home, "if she just talks to them about sickness all the time the way she did this afternoon. Why, I'm all worn out."

But I was borne up by the feeling of having done my duty handsomely, and had even decided to have her again in two or three weeks or so. I concluded to make it for supper next time, however. Sunday afternoon is a terribly long stretch.

The next Sunday, I had just got the children to bed for their nap, and was setting the table for Will's and my dinner when I happened to look down the street, and whom should I see but Cousin Effie coming along in her gray cravenette coat and gray feather hat. It was her best outfit and she always wore it, summer and winter. In the winter, when the coat wasn't warm enough, she wore a quilted jacket under it, and in summer, when the coat was too warm, she just wore it anyway, and suffered.

Sure enough, she turned in at our yard.

I MUST admit that I was a little disappointed, but I didn't show it. I was as cordial as could be, and insisted that she stay for dinner. After dinner, while she helped me with the dishes, Will said he'd got to take a check down to Howard Merton's—he'd forgotten to give it to Howard the day before—and he never came back till after Cousin Effie had gone.

The main trouble that I have found with feeling virtuous is that, after a time, it wears thin. It holds you up fine for the first two or three times, and then it begins to sag under the weight. I didn't feel nearly as well supported this Sunday as I had the week before. In fact, I'm not sure that I didn't complain about it a little bit to Will. He didn't take it very seriously, however. He had seen Cousin Effie around his own home all the years before he got married, and he'd got used to her.

Friday night, being Will's Lodge night, I had invited Roger and Dulcie to supper. Our houses are so close together that Dulcie can put little Dulcie to bed in their room and, by leaving our living-room window open a little, we can hear her if she cries. Dulcie and I have a very pleasant evening together while the boys are gone, and, if they get back early enough, the four of us have a game of Five Hundred before they go home. It is a lovely arrangement, and it was a terrible blow when, about half past five, I looked out into the gathering dusk and saw Cousin Effie's gray feather hat and cravenette coat turning in at our walk.

There was nothing to do, of course, but to ask her for supper. She accepted with a kind of matter-of-factness that was ominous, once you got to thinking about it. She had come, calmly expecting to stay to supper. That was the way she always used to do with Father and Mother Horton.

WELL, it simply ruined the evening. Dulcie and I had to be polite, and we couldn't talk about anything that interested us. By half past nine, Dulcie was so bored that she made an excuse and went home. Cousin Effie stayed, and told me about the time she had appendicitis, till Will got home.

"I don't see how I'm going to stand it if she keeps dropping in like this without being asked, all the time," I said to Will that night.

But he, fresh from a pleasant evening at the Lodge, seemed to think I was making much of a trifle.

It made me kind of provoked, and I made up my mind that the next time Cousin Effie dropped in like that, I wouldn't ask her to stay. But the next time, which was only the next Wednesday, we were just sitting down to the table, and I couldn't get out of it. Will said that he had to go back to the office for a little while that evening. And he never came back till ten o'clock.

By that time, the feeling of being virtuous had died on me altogether. I was more than provoked; I was mad. I had listened to symptoms till I was nearly crazy. When Will came back from having walked over home with her, I told him that I simply couldn't stand it.

"Oh, she's not as bad as all that," Will said mildly.

At that, I just flew off the handle and stuck in the wall.

"You don't know anything about how bad she is," I said. "You never see her. You do just the same as you used to do at home before you got married—you go off somewhere. You don't know anything about it."

"Well," said Will, "I don't see what we can do about it. We told the folks we'd look out for her, and we can't begrudge the poor old soul a meal once in a while."

"I wouldn't begrudge her three meals a day!" I declared. "It's sitting for hours and listening to her troubles. She doesn't talk about anything except being sick and nobody coming to see her."

Will yawned. "Well, if we don't get to bed, we'll be sick ourselves," he said, "and nobody'll come to see us."

And with that, he seemed to feel that the subject was closed.

From that time on, Cousin Effie began to be a perfect nightmare to me. We were never just settling down to a cozy supper and the prospects of a nice evening together that I wouldn't hear her knock at the door. I got to know it and dread it. She'd give a faint, deprecating little tap, and push the door open and call:

"Anybody home?"

With two babies, you couldn't simply keep still and pretend not to be there.

She always came just a little while before meal time, along about noon on a Sunday, or around five o'clock week days. I confess that I tried once to out-wait her. I had been cleaning the attic, and I was dog-tired. We'd had a good dinner, and I wasn't going to bother much for supper and was going to bed right afterward. About half past five, I happened to look out the window, and there came that old gray cravenette coat. When Will came home I met him at the kitchen door.

"Cousin Effie's here," I whispered, "and I'm not going to ask her for supper. I'm dead tired, and there isn't enough, anyway. Don't say a word about supper, and we'll wait till she goes."

Anyone who's tried that bright little stunt can guess how it worked. Will hung around like a fish out of water, looking at me reproachfully. I just sat tight. When the conversation would languish, I would just let it lie where it dropped. But after a short silence, Cousin Effie would sigh a little and start on another symptom. Outwait her! I waited till twenty minutes of eight, and then I gave up and got supper. If I hadn't, there's not the faintest doubt in my mind that she'd have been there yet.

IT WAS worst of all when we had company. I tried every way I could to keep her from coming those times, but it practically never worked. I'd say just as cordially as I could:

"Come again, Cousin Effie. Any time except Saturday evening. We've an engagement for that night."

Saturday about five o'clock, I'd look out the window and see that old gray feather hat turning in at the gate, just as sure as shooting.

"Oh, are you having company?" she'd say, as though surprised. "Well, I'll run along and come some other time."

The only trouble with it was that she never did run along.

It got me to feeling edgy at Will. We'd never had anything come between us before that we hadn't worked out some way or other, together. But Will wasn't with me on this. When I'd say anything, he'd just say how we'd promised the folks, and how it would kill his mother if we weren't nice to Cousin Effie. And then, on one flimsy excuse or another, he'd slide out, and leave me with all the "being nice" to do myself. Over and over, I tried to make Will understand; but I couldn't. It was as though I was trying to talk to a foreigner who couldn't understand my language.

I don't know how things would have worked out eventually if it hadn't been for Kathie's coming. I was getting more and more upset, and more and more aggrieved at Will. Why, I was so upset that when I was going through my scrap bag and came to a piece of gray cloth, suddenly I felt perfectly furious and at the same time wanted to sit down and cry. I couldn't even think why, at first. Then it dawned on me that it was because the cloth reminded me of Cousin Effie's cravenette, coming along through the twilight.

But one Sunday, I was just setting the table when I heard the familiar little tap at the door, and a minute later, Cousin Effie's "Anybody home?"

"Oh, hello, Cousin Effie," said Will cordially. "Come in. You're just in time for dinner."

I went on making the gravy, in a kind of dull hopelessness. I knew that Will would be as cordial as could be all through dinner, but immediately afterward make an excuse to go somewhere. It seemed to me I just couldn't bear another afternoon with Cousin Effie, though I knew that I'd have to.

But just as we were sitting down to the table, the telephone rang. It was Mother.

"Guess who's here!" she said. "Kathie."

I nearly dropped the receiver; we hadn't been expecting Kathie for another week.

"They're on the way down to Elmer's," Mother went on. "They're going to take the night train to-night. You and Will bring the babies and come right down. There's plenty of dinner for you all."

I hadn't seen my sister for over a year, and I'd never seen her new baby. I was so excited that I said we'd be right there, before I even thought of Cousin Effie She had heard the conversation, and began saying something vague about running along. But that did seem too mean, with the dinner all on the table and she with none ready at home.

"You and Will stay here and eat this dinner," I said. "It's all ready—you'll find the dessert in the ice box. I'll take the children." Will agreed, and as he was helping me get the twins into the back seat of the flivver, he said in an undertone that he'd be down as soon as Cousin Effie went.

I must confess that not once during the afternoon or evening did I even think of Will or Cousin Effie. I put the babies to bed in Mother's room and stayed till Kathie's train left at ten o'clock. Then, for the first time, I recalled that Will had been supposed to come, and hadn't.

Father rode over home with me to help with the children, who were piled into the back seat without ever waking them up. He said he'd like to walk back home in the night stillness and get all our talk out of his ears, so that he'd have some chance of sleeping that night. As we pulled up in front of our house, Will came down the street. He had just taken Cousin Effie home and was about to start over after me.

I don't know whether Father noticed anything queer about Will or not, but I certainly did. He looked positively groggy, like a prize-fighter, I imagine, who has been practically knocked out but has been just able to struggle to his feet.

He carried the babies up-stairs to their cribs, and came back looking like a man slowly staggering out of a trance.

"Dot," he said, "that woman has been here this entire day."

"Cousin Effie, you mean?" I asked, puzzled. His tone of voice would suggest that he was speaking of some stranger he had just met for the first time.

"Cousin Effie," he said. "I thought you'd never get back. I've been nearly crazy."

"What did she do?" I asked, wondering what on earth she could have done that was new and surprising enough to shock him so.

"Do?" he repeated. "Do? She's done nothing for nine solid hours but talk about her troubles. She's told me about every sickness she's had since croup. I wish she'd died of one of them! She's told me nine thousand times that nobody comes to see her. Good lord, I shouldn't think anybody would."

I waited for him to go on, and when he didn't, I said, "Well, what else?" There was nothing new in all this.

Will looked at me as though I'd insulted him.

"What else?" (Continued on page 174)

Will said he'd got to take a check down to Howard Merton's . . . and he never came back till after Cousin Effie had gone

My Ship Must Have Got Sunk

I've been waiting for it forty years, and if it doesn't come in soon, I guess I'll have to give up—But I've had a pretty good time

By Archie Chadbourne

PHOTOGRAPH BY H. L. STANDLEY

Archie Chadbourne, of Colorado Springs, is a truck driver who has had a strenuous time shooing the wolf off his door mat. Recently, in this magazine, he told you of his adventures with debt, and in the accompanying article he again takes you behind the scenes and reveals how a fellow with a small wage and a large sense of humor makes a go of life

WE POOR people should have no children, at least not according to the advocates of birth control. And even they hedge a little at times, and say we should have no more than we can afford to raise and educate. Well, Ione and I have just two more than we can afford—Edyrl and Lyril. I know families with seven and even more children who really could afford none at all. And as far as birth control is concerned, whatever that is, it would make little difference with us poor folks. We have children because we want them, love them, and need them—even if our ultra-ideas of civilization do not.

I certainly cannot see how any economist can argue against large families for us poor, for where else would he get his raw material for his machines, his truck drivers, his tradesmen, his servants. We have a very definite place in the world, a service which no others would perform. And who shall say that because we are poor we are not happy? Is not happiness one of the ends to be desired? Culture and education and wealth do not create happiness, though a few of us poor would be willing to risk contentment for a few more shekels. Happiness is some indefinable thing which comes from a philosophy within a man, rich or poor, who has adjusted himself to his environment and is working out his destiny as he sees it. The simple ash man may be equally as contented and happy beneath his layer of ashes as is the moderately well-to-do business man beneath his mask of sophistication.

IF I were giving advice to a young married couple, poor like Ione and I have always been, I would say go ahead and have children right away. You will have to go into debt for lots of things, so why not for babies? Ione and I know what we are talking about, for I was drawing twelve dollars a week when Edyrl was born and the doctor took ten of it—that is, he charged it, though he did not get it for about a year. I draw twenty-five now, and the doctor charges twenty-five for the same service he performed then, and other expenses have gone up in proportion, so we would have gained nothing by waiting.

When Ione and I married we set down in black and white just what it would cost to bring a baby into the world. We got hold of a budget somewhere which told how much it would cost to raise that baby into maturity, and we discussed pro and con whether or not we should wait until I made a living wage. Then we chucked the figures away and let our consciences be our guide. Edyrl was born, and paid for in instalments, like 'most everything else we get. But she was not born in a hospital with me walking up and down the corridor wringing my hands and tearing my hair waiting for the doctor to come out and tell me it was a girl. No; we are poor folks, and I acted as a practical nurse along with Ione's mother, and the doctor kept hot-footing it across the street to a telephone, for he was holding down two jobs at the same time.

We thought it would be a shame to raise Edyrl alone, so, three years later, we planned for Lyril. One baby was still-born in the meantime. If we had waited until we could have afforded another one Edyrl would likely have been a great-grandmother, for poor folks who wait until they can afford luxuries never get them. By the time Lyril arrived, we had sold the big wicker baby cab and had bought a folding cart we could carry on the street car. So Ione went down to a second-hand store, and, as luck would have it, she found our original cab and bought it back for seven dollars more than we sold it for to the dealer. That is one reason we are poor—we sell things we may need again because we need ready money before we need the article. It's also one of the reasons so many second-hand stores are kept going.

No doubt motherhood counts in emotions for a poor mother, but fatherhood means little in emotions for a poor father. I was in the corner grocery after Edyrl was born, and the groceryman said, "Isn't it a grand feeling to be a father?"

I glanced at him sharply. I thought he was spoofing me, but he was in earnest. He had a spoiled boy of three years. To him, there may have been a wonderful feeling as he looked down the ages and still found himself living over again in his children and his children's children. I could not see that far. About the only emotion I was conscious of was one of profound relief that the baby was here and yelling lustily, and that Ione was sleeping the sleep of great exhaustion. I saw no further into the future than a rather indefinite wonder as to how the deuce I would ever pay the overhead and upkeep charges on Edyrl, for incidental expenses had already begun with that first nursing bottle. Believe me, baby budgets may do all right as a criterion of flat or excursion rates, but the incidentals attach themselves to those budgets thicker than germs on an alley cat.

ONLY last month Ione bought material and made a costume, so Edyrl could appear in an athletic school drill. The thing cost two dollars and thirty cents, and is of no more value now than an appendix is to a man. There was ninety cents' worth of wings for Lyril, whose Sunday-school teacher thought she would make a "darling angel," though we never knew how she got that way. Then there are the pencils they lose, and the special collection for Abraham Lincoln's monument, and the sentimental selection entitled "give a dime to save Old Ironsides."

Sure, we want our children to be patriotic while they can; but a poor man's patriotism gets a smudge on it when every dime he spends that way spells the difference between a picture show for the family and an evening at home contemplating the Saturday shoe-repair bill. And entertainment is just as much a part of living as food and clothes.

A poor man hires no nursemaid to stay with the baby while Mother runs downtown shopping or goes to a matinée.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Mother takes care of the youngsters all day, and the nights are often longer than the days if the baby has the three-months colic. We used to take turns jogging Edyrl up and down the alley back of our house, because the alley was just rough enough to make the little tyke enjoy the motion of the go-cart, and sleep. Perhaps you never have doctored an infant for a too rich milk diet, only to find after a couple of days that the poor little thing has the earache. Or maybe some misguided mother brings in some contagious disease, thinking you would rather have the baby take it now than after it gets older. Believe me, if there is no money for another sort of diversion the accumulation of these cares will drive a woman distracted—and a man bughouse.

I FEEL for those poor parents who have remained home with the baby for so long that they are ready to rend each other asunder unless they get away from it. So they choose a day when the baby has been exceptionally good, perhaps has slept most of the afternoon, and they seek an evening's entertainment together. They go out in fear and trembling. If the little fellow cries, they will not only lose their pleasure but also the money they have expended. But the mother says, "Baby's been feeling so good that perhaps—"

Yes, just "perhaps," for, right in the middle of the best part of the show or lecture or musicale, there is a fretful wail, followed by an anxious effort to hush the infant, then another wail and the storm breaks. The child lets out a peal that would crack a Liberty Bell, and while the father urges the mother to remain (or does not), they make their way through the gantlet of glaring, unsympathetic eyes. The speaker stops, if there is a speaker, and even folks with babies of their own whisper unkind things.

Ione and I think the United States Government should publish a monthly baby magazine, or at least subsidize one, and a five-year subscription should be sent free to all parents upon the birth of a child.

This largest industry in the world is largely a hit-or-miss proposition. We have no time to be trained for the raising of children, which is the real vocation of every adult, whether he fulfills that obligation or not. We have time for everything else, it seems; but we give children no thought whatsoever until they are more or less forced upon our attention by the advent of a squirming infant, wanted or unwanted.

We raise children by instinct, just as the lower animals do, only they raise their offspring into a world controlled by instinct, while we push ours into a world governed by rational thought. Oh, yes, they go to school; but the school must undo much that has been done in an untrained home before it can start even a foundation upon which to build citizenship. Nearly every parent does the very best he knows for his children, and he would do better if a little information were shoved down his throat.

The landlord should certainly be in favor of a system of enlightenment, for untrained children are the bane of his existence. They destroy his property. I do not blame him for refusing to rent to a family with children. Nor do I blame that woman who has been out house-hunting all day if, when she comes to the end of that wonderful round of inspections and turn-downs and the last landlord on her list asks, "How many children have you?" she replies, "One."

I have pondered a bit lately over those college students who found life so insipid that they decided to commit suicide. It seems to me they are rather egotistical. They had not begun to drain life's cup of adventure. I want to suggest to any more of them who seek suicide to get away from this deadly existence, that they marry and have children right away. I suggest, too, that the husband secure a job driving a truck, and that they live on a truck-driver's wages. If they have to fight for a chance to live, let alone for their esthetic education, they may find life more endurable. They will not be nearly so anxious to propel themselves into the great beyond which, however interesting theoretically as a place of mystery, may not be so alluring to most of us as a reality. A truck driver will never commit suicide because he failed to get a kick out of life. He receives plenty of kicks.

NOW, about the additional expenses of raising children. Holidays are periods when whole families get together and have a whale of a time at a whale of an expense. Christmas is the worst offender. As far as we poor folks are concerned, a great many of us at that most joyful season of the year wish that Christ had been born the last day of February on a leap year.

If You Ask Me:

You're out of luck if you hit only the high spots

A FRIEND of mine was crossing Wyoming on his way to Yellowstone Park. Out in the desert, amidst the sage brush, his eyes caught a glint of yellow. Stepping from his car, he discovered a clump of exquisite little yellow blossoms.

As he was reveling in their fragrance and beauty a big touring car came tearing along at fifty miles an hour. It drew up with shrieking brakes.

"Need help?" shouted the man at the wheel, a man whose set, tired face and darting eyes showed the tension of hair-trigger nerves.

"No, thanks; I'm all right."

"Then why in the devil are you stopping in the middle of the desert?"

"To examine these lovely little flowers. You and your party had better take a look. They're most unusual."

"Stop to see some flowers? Not much!" His tone was frankly contemptuous. "The gardener on my estate has got an acre of 'em. I'm on my way to Yellowstone to see some real sights. And I'll make it before night or bust a hame-string. We've sure eaten up distance in the last three days."

SEMI-DEMI-OCCASIONALLY I get roped into a tea party. My 1928 digression occurred last week. Arriving at the studio, I found nineteen frankly bored individuals trying to make conversation. "Why don't they bring on booze instead of this slop?" asked one of them. I assume it was mere coincidence that cocktails appeared almost immediately—cocktails with a "real kick." As a second round disappeared, the barometer rose rapidly. Nervous laughter, garish gayety, banished the late ennui. As I passed down into the street I could still hear the merry din.

"What's the matter with you?" a friend asked that evening.

"I'm thinking of this jazz age," I replied. "I'm thinking of how we tear along in motor-cars, hell-bent on getting from here to there or from there to here, giving no heed to the quiet wonders that lie in between. I'm thinking of the number of people who can't even keep the breath of conversation going without resorting to a gin-charged pulmotor. How much of life's real flavor is missed by human beings who depend for their thrills on—"

"On what?" asked my friend, as I hesitated for a phrase.

"On how many miles to the gallon and how many smiles to the quart!"

"By Jove!" Said Roosevelt "It Reads Like The Real Thing!"

He was speaking of a book of poems by Edwin Arlington Robinson, then an unknown young man; but his obscurity soon vanished after the President took him up—This is the story of Robinson, a boy genius, who is now one of the greatest of all American poets

By M. K. Wisehart

Once upon a midnight dreary, while I pondered, weak and weary,
Over many a quaint and curious volume of forgotten lore—

BUT wait! If we begin with a recitation, we should know something of the time and place. The time, 1874. The scene: the comfortable living-room of an old New England homestead, a large clapboarded house, painted yellow, in Lincoln Avenue, Gardiner, Maine.

On the floor, in front of the huge fireplace, sits a boy of five with deep, dark, exulting eyes. His mother, who is occupied with a workbasket, smiles and nods, encouraging him as he recites in his childlike, singsong, rhythmic way, half of all the lines of the Raven:

"Leave no black plume as a token of that lie thy soul has spoken!
Leave my loneliness unbroken! quit the bust above my door!
Take thy beak from out my heart, and take thy form from off my door!"
Quoth the Raven, "Nevermore."

Now, this child, since he was four years old, had bubbled over with poetry and song like a brook in a springtime of freshets. At that age he had learned to read. Never was there a time, it seemed, when he couldn't read. The ability had come to him so easily that no one knew how he acquired it. An unusual child, a puzzling child, much that he had not been taught had come to him as though from the air.

It happened that the boy's father, a retired shipbuilder and timber merchant, was a great lover of poetry and a constant reader of it. Among the many books in the house was a certain collection of verse, William Cullen Bryant's "Library of Poetry and Song." Father and son lived in this book as in a Cave of Delight; amid winds and torrents, amid storms and shipwreck, amid summer skies and quiet pastoral scenes. They had learned to love the days of old when knights were bold and ladies fair, when armor shone and swords gleamed and steeds were prancing. Above all, they were in the thrall of a haunting mystery, the magic power of lyric words.

What the boy read in this book and what his father read to him hung in his memory; and his memory was like the taut string of a musical instrument. It was ready to vibrate when plucked. "What was it that the Wizard said to Lochiel?" the father would ask, and he would give the first line of Thomas Campbell's stirring ballad:

Lochiel, Lochiel! Beware of the day

And the child would pick it up—

When the Lowlands shall meet thee in battle array,
For a field of the dead rushes red on my sight,
And the clans of Culloden are scattered in fight.

So he would go on, chanting line upon line, including that famous and oft-quoted couplet:

'Tis the sunset of life gives me mystical lore,
And coming events cast their shadows before.

And nobody realized that this in itself was one of those prophetic shadows, a forecast of a rare and great event in American letters! His parents thought the boy precocious, to be sure. They liked him to recite. It amused them. They encouraged it. But nobody said, "He'll be a great poet some day!" It would have seemed too ridiculous!

The years glide by. Certain events have intervened. The boy has grown to a young man. He has had one year in Harvard, returning home because of the death of his father and the prolonged illness of his mother.

NEXT door to the yellow clapboard house in Lincoln Avenue lived a man named A. T. Schuman, a physician, cultured, highly educated. He wrote verses for the pleasure it gave him. He talked with the youth from next door about how poetry is made. The talk was of versification and rhythm, of feet and cæsura, of quatrains and octaves, of ballades and sonnets, and the various classical forms. And one day, as a kind of exercise, the young man wrote a poem in the ballade form, which he dedicated to his friend the physician. "Ballade of Broken Flutes" is what he called it. Here it is. You will enjoy reading it:

In dreams I crossed a barren land,
A land of ruin, far away;
Around me hung on every hand
A deathful stillness of decay;
And silent, as in bleak dismay
That song should thus forsaken be,
On that forgotten ground there lay
The broken flutes of Arcady.

The forest that was all so grand
When pipes and tabors had their sway,
Stood leafless now, a ghostly band
Of skeletons in cold array.
A lonely surge of ancient spray
Told of an unforgetful sea,
But iron blows had hushed for aye
The broken flutes of Arcady.

No more by summer breezes fanned,
The place was desolate and gray;
But still my dream was to command
New life into that shrunken clay.
I tried it. And you scan to-day,
With uncommiserating glee,
The songs of one who strove to play
The broken flutes of Arcady.

ENVOY

So, Rock, I join the common fray,
To fight where Mammon may decree;
And leave to crumble as they may,
The broken flutes of Arcady.

BUT this young man had no thought of leaving the broken flutes to crumble where they lay. That was just a poet's fancy way of putting it. He wrote and wrote, poem after poem. For fifteen years, without recognition or substantial reward, never faltering, he lived in the realm of poetic thought, pursuing the quest of rhythm and rhyme and word. In all, for nearly forty years, he has applied himself to this most elusive and sensitive art, and with a fidelity and affectionate devotion that is almost unparalleled in literary history.

To-day, he is a man of fifty-eight, tall, slender, with high forehead and dark thinning hair, and quiet contemplative eyes that look through spectacles. Fame has come to him. On both sides of the Atlantic he is acclaimed as the greatest poet America has produced. More than fifteen volumes of poetry bear his name, including "Children of the Night," "Captain Craig," "The Town Down the River," "The Man Against the Sky," "The Three Taverns," "The Man Who Died Twice," "Merlin," "Launcelot," and "Tristram," (Continued on page 76)

Edwin Arlington Robinson

"THE greatest poet America has yet produced," is a comment often made about Mr. Robinson. His most recent book, "Tristram," attracted wide attention on both sides of the Atlantic; his numerous other works, among them "Captain Craig," "The Man Against the Sky," "The Town Down the River," and "The Man Who Died Twice," are increasingly well known from year to year. In all, he has fifteen published volumes of poetry. But fame came to him reluctantly; only after years of obscurity, toil and unfailing faith did he emerge. President Roosevelt rescued the young poet from jobs that were too arduous. Mr. Robinson was born in Head Tide, Maine, in 1869. He was able to read at the age of four, became a lover of poetry when five, and has been writing since he was eleven.

THE PICTURE below shows Henry Middleton Rutledge at the age of twenty-one, when he was a Colonel of Infantry in the Confederate States Army. His gallant feats as a leader in that war are still recounted by battlefield guides. At the left you see the Colonel as a very old man, but still erect, and dressed for a hunt. He was a hunter to the end of his days.

MY COLONEL

By Archibald Rutledge

THE fact that Colonel Henry Middleton Rutledge was my father need not, I think, with discerning and considerate readers, convict me of immodesty in telling his story. It is not as if I were claiming anything for myself. I had nothing to do with his creation. Here was a real man, the personification of a great era in American life. Why should I not give what I know to be an authentic picture of him, one that I trust will be convincing? That he was six feet tall; that one shoulder drooped because of two wounds, one from Malvern Hill and one from Antietam; that his fine head was regal in its carriage, with its thin aquiline nose, its eyes the color of the blue early-morning sky, its strong and tender mouth, half-hidden under the white mustache; that the cast of his countenance was gentle, yet with nobility and pride and honor suffusing it softly —all these matters are in a way descriptive. But it was by behavior that I came to know the real character of this picturesque personality.

I used very often to drive in a buggy with my Colonel from his plantation on the river to the seacoast village, ten miles away, where he had his summer home. Such a journey reveals the character of one's companion.

BORN a woodsman, the Colonel, to his last day, took the keenest interest in all forms of wild life, and spoke of game birds and animals with an accuracy that is attained by observation alone, and with a gravity which gaged his feeling. He would stop to show me the very spot where, two years before, in the mist of morning, he had seen a huge stag walk across the road. He would point out to me on the sandy highway the track of a deer or of a fox, a raccoon or a wildcat.

I recall his showing me late one afternoon a broad, straight, shallow gulley that had just been made across the road. "That's the track of a diamondback rattlesnake," he said; "a lordly serpent like that never does so ignominious a thing as to wriggle. He travels straight. That's more than some men do; yet I don't consider him a proper associate for any man."

The Colonel had a certain spiritual delicacy in his appreciation of all things beautiful. This awareness of his loveliness often made him totally unconscious of the somewhat significant detail of time. A wild rose, blushing alone by the dusty roadside; a wild flag-flower, standing like a blue banner beside some woodland pool; the naïve beauty of a tiny green fern, the dream song of the parula warbler, or the wild, sweet chant of the mocking-bird—all of these waylaid his soul, deliciously ambushed him, so that, through much lingering, he was often long after dark in reaching home.

But his human contacts were most revealing. The road we traveled was a lonely one, through heavy forest; yet here and there were humble homes, standing in small fields; in some of these lived whites, in others negroes. With all of them the Colonel's relations were the same in affectionate solicitude. I recall counting one day the requisitions that were made on him by his many and importuning friends, who knew well that his buggy was always loaded with produce from the plantation.

As a matter of fact, when the ordinary planter drove by, these pinelanders paid no attention to him; but when my Colonel's old sorrel horse hove in sight, and the familiar identifying squeaks of his buggy wheels were heard in the land, work came practically to a standstill, and people walked out to their front yards and actually into the road to hail him, to wave to him, to give him commissions to the village store, and literally to rob him in friendly fashion of everything he had in his buggy. The first hold-up on this particular day came in front of the cabin of Old Ephraim, an aboriginal black, to whom the Colonel was very devoted.

Battered hat in his hand, and ancient affection in his eyes, Ephraim stood beside the buggy while the man whom he revered as his lord and master bestowed upon him his only cigar. There was also between them a little subtle badinage, that can occur, I think, only between two such old cronies. And there was a promise on the part of the Colonel to bring to Ephraim on the morrow some medicine for a vague ailment that he described as "plain worriment and misery in the back."

AT THE next house, the abode of a mendicant pinelander, a man of small means but of huge family, the Colonel stopped to inquire about little Winnie, one of the children. The other children—it seemed to me that there were scores —were eagerly draped on the staggering fence, their eyes fixed on the Colonel and on his buggy. They had seen good things come before from beneath that friendly buggy seat.

"Colonel," said the mother, a gaunt, sweet-faced woman, "Winnie ain't so good. 'Pears that she won't eat anything."

Under the buggy seat the old gentleman reached—he could always reach something for someone else!—drew forth the family pail of fresh milk, and handed it to the grateful mother, who thanked him almost tearfully. There was a small basket of peaches, too, that the Colonel had intended for his Sunday dessert; but he couldn't resist the bright appeal in the eyes of the little children. As we drove off, I overheard the mother say to herself thankfully, "That man's almost raised my children."

A Real Colonel, And a Very Real Man

THE Southern Colonel—that is, the authentic one, and not the flamboyant, flimsy creation you sometimes see on the stage or read about in books—was one of the rarest, strongest, and most fascinating types America has produced. To understand him is to understand the civilization of the Old South and, to some extent at least, the underlying history of the Civil War.

That is one reason why THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE asked Archibald Rutledge to write for you the story of his father. Another reason is that the story of Colonel Henry Middleton Rutledge is so intensely interesting that it would fascinate you, even though it had no historical significance. Colonel Rutledge was a genuine Southern Colonel, genuine in character and in title. His greatness as a man did not depend upon his ability to say, "By God, sir!" in a resonant voice! He was not theatrical; he was humble. His heart was ruler of his head. He had vast capacity for loving, and so he was vastly loved by the Confederate soldiers whom he, a boy colonel of twenty-one, led so gallantly in the Civil War; and by his neighbors, both white and black. "Equality," said the Colonel, "may not be possible, but brotherhood always is."

"Well, for gosh sakes!" the boy repeated. "Why, in Detroit I bet there are five hundred garage men could fix that in 'n hour! . . . For gosh sakes!"

The Dee-troit Kid

Everybody said he was no good—not even to himself

By Harold Titus

OF COURSE he had a name. It was Roscoe, Roscoe something-or-other; but if anyone in town ever knew the rest of it that knowledge was forgotten.

He came up with Ralph Wayman, the Detroit attorney who has the big white summer home on the bluff. He was some sort of distant relative by marriage, it was said, who had been left at school age without anyone to look after him except Wayman, or any resources, except those that Wayman might see fit to offer him.

He was not in reality one of the family; nor yet was he a servant. He held an anomalous position in that large household, more like a guest-chauffeur and handy man than anything else.

The Wayman family had not been established for the summer forty-eight hours before the Kid took his first plunge into prominence. The timing gears on the attorney's car had gone wrong and the machine was coaxed into Hank Beauchamp's garage, the only garage in town, for readjustment.

Hank, methodical, honest mechanic that he was, labored throughout the forenoon on the puzzling job, putting off a half-dozen others who had minor difficulties, more, probably, because of his high pride in always going through with what he undertook than for any other reason. He was that way. He missed his dinner, and was hot and greasy and perplexed when the boy came down for the car.

"Well, for gosh sakes!" the Kid piped in his thin voice. "I thought you'd have that bus ready hours ago!"

Hank looked up from his stooping, spat, and gave the lad a long look. He is a man of few words but profound feelings; he is a leading citizen, with a dignified position among the rest, and as sensitive as he is honest.

"Maybe to-morrow, even," he said slowly. "But I guess I'm on the right track now."

"Well, for gosh sakes!" the boy repeated. "Why, in Detroit I bet there are five hundred garage men could fix that in 'n hour! For gosh sakes!"

Hank went through the motions of spitting again and his eye gleamed. "This ain't Detroit," he said mildly, but his dark face smoldered, and his helpers grinned at each other, and a couple of resorters who had known Hank for years smiled.

"Say, I sh'd think you'd come down to Detroit and get up to date," the Kid went on. He meant it, this was no sarcasm; he twisted his head seriously. "It ought to pay you. You could come down in winter, and I bet I could fix it up to get you a job where you'd learn enough about new motors, anyhow, so's you wouldn't get into jams like this. Now, if you was a real, first-class service man, you'd—"

The verbatim report of Hank's interruption has no place here. It was sufficient, and witnesses stated solemnly that he did not repeat a solitary oath in his rebuke, and that it lasted for minutes and minutes and minutes!

"And what did the Kid say then?" someone asked.

"Never turned a hair! Like water on a tin roof. He started in again, telling us all what good mechanics there are in Dee-troit, and there was nothing to do but let him get it all out of his system!"

On the following day, the roof of Nate Hosmer's house caught fire from the chimney. The boys turned out, rang the fire bell, dragged the hose cart up the street, got water going, and soused out the blaze before it did much damage. When they were hanging up hose and putting the equipment back, Wayman's ward or nephew or chauffeur, or whatever you wanted to call him, showed up, elbowing through the crowd until he was right in the center.

"For gosh sakes, is that thing all you got to fight fire with?" he piped, eying our lone hose reel, and clearly honest in his astonishment. "Why, in Detroit I bet they got five hundred engines! And every one of 'em can throw four streams of water that big around," measuring very generously indeed. "Why, for gosh sakes, if you'd turned one stream from a Detroit engine on that house, just now, it'd tore the roof off!"

Ben Wilcox, the supervisor, said, "We only aim to put out fires, boy!"

"Sure. I know. But . . . for gosh sakes!" He shook his head depreciatingly as he walked around our very modest apparatus.

THE boys try to make the town pleasant for summer people. They, you see, give the place its commercial life. To be sure, there are farms, back from the water, and the fishing fleet employs thirty men or more when Lake Michigan is open; but it is from the summer folks that our merchants get the bulk of their business.

Last year, the boys all chipped in and arranged to have strings of colored lights hung across the street in the one business block. It would look pretty nice, it was agreed; and when the linesmen began work a little group gathered to watch.

Before they were well started, the boy from Wayman's came down on an errand. He could not resist other people's affairs, so he joined the crowd and found out what was going on.

"For gosh sakes!" he began. "Only eight lights in a string, and only three strings? Why, you'd ought to've seen Detroit at the Elks Convention. Wood'ard Avenue was all lights! Clear from the river to the park, and that's further 'n from here to Mr. Wayman's. And pillars and arches all along, and all the pillars and arches covered with lights. If you're thinking of decorating a street, you'd ought to see Detroit streets at some big convention time!"

And so on. Every item of his experience in our town brought out some reference, some comparison, to Detroit, and before he had been with us a fortnight he was known from the Dune to the Flats, from the oldest native fisherman to the pertest outside flapper, as the Detroit Kid.

He was everywhere; always in the forefront of any group; always pushing himself forward physically and conversationally. The questionable rating he had in the Wayman household had not kept him, at first, from doing the things other boys of his years did. He danced and swam and played with the rest of the boys and girls, and he did it with an enthusiasm which was to become, in retrospect, rather pathetic.

But after a brief time he was left out of planned activities, and when simply being left out did not keep him from joining in these diversions, he was pointedly and at times brutally told to stay away.

Once this happened at the Country Club, when three cars of young people were embarking for an expedition and the Detroit Kid, arriving just then, promptly joined them.

"Going some place?" he asked, face lighting. He climbed into a car, tucked a hamper of sandwiches between his feet, and began telling the others about the fine drives out of Detroit. He spoke into an embarrassed silence; but before he became aware of it the youth at the wheel turned and said, with flushed frankness:

"Don't think there'll be room for you this time, Detroit. You see, we've got the cars filled up."

"Oh, sure," he said, getting out. "Too bad. . . . Next time, though, eh?"

Undaunted, apparently; but he stood on the steps where a group of older people sat, and watched the party flee from him. After a moment, he said to nobody in particular, in a brooding sort of tone:

"For gosh sakes! Now, take it in Detroit, folks are sort of friendly!"

THEREAFTER, he was cut brusquely and completely and, seeming to realize that he was out of the picture so far as the summer folks were concerned, he turned to the town group. He commenced showing up at the pool-room early in the evening, and would shoot pool with our boys until closing time. He was a bad shot, rendering the impression that he had never played before.

He liked the boys, but somehow he bungled his attempt to fraternize with them. He would look at them closely, with that peculiarly shining glance which betrays a youth's ardor for another, would lose laughingly, or win—infrequently—with great glee.

But always he was telling them about Detroit, always upholding Detroit as the last word in authority or precedent. And, because of this, he remained an outsider while among them. They wearied of him, began to make a butt of him.

He took to hanging around Larsen's boathouse, interested in the pleasure craft that Ole cared for. He was no mean handler of a motorboat, either, because Wayman had one in Detroit and he had helped about it. He was a fairly good novice mechanic, and when Ole was rushed and the Kid had nothing to keep him at Wayman's for an hour or so he would pitch in and help finish a job. But Larsen finally grew weary of his everlasting chatter, and gruffly told him to stay away.

The Kid transferred his attention to the fishing fleet after that. He would show up when the first tug home made the piers, and look at the lift, and tell the crew something or other about Detroit. He asked Ezra Graham if he might go along some day, and Ezra, always tolerant, said that he might. But evidently certain well-defined duties at Wayman's restricted his hours. He did not go on the lake with the tugs that summer.

What Wayman thought of this boy was not easily determined. He was a grumpy old duffer, anyhow, had a large family of young children, relatives galore visiting him, and kept much to his own household. He was not easy to do business with, our merchants said, and was always grumbling, so it was not taken to mean much when he was heard upbraiding the Kid. He scolded him for letting the gas supply get low in the car, for being down-town instead of mowing the lawn, for neglecting other duties, and his scoldings were not mild. Now and then he would grumble to some of us about the Kid's shortcomings.

But it was not until early September, when people began to start homeward, that we realized anything in particular was up.

We saw him knock ice from the plant his feet astride the tiller,

Wayman walked into Harding's store a day before he left.

"Harding, I'm going to leave Roscoe here as caretaker for my place this winter," he said.

"Roscoe?"

"Yeah; the boy. Detroit Kid, you call him. Got to park him somewhere; can't have him around home blabbing all the time; can't turn a rattle-headed kid like that loose in a city these days. He'll board at Larsen's, and you let him have what he needs in the way of clothes and cigarettes. Hold him down to twenty-five a month, though. If anything happens, if he gets hurt or sick, see 't he gets a doctor, and I'll make it right with you." He turned to go out, then added, "Hope he don't talk your arms off!"

THE next day the Waymans drove off, big car overflowing with them, and the Kid waved good-by from Beauchamp's garage. It was blowing in cold from the lake, and he stood there in his light knickers and thin blazer, hands in his pockets, shivering a little, after they had gone. On his face was a queer look, as if something important had happened, the proportions of which he was trying to realize.

little iron railings so he could have hand hold; saw him even saw him stoop to yell his orders to the man at the motor

"Well, Dee-troit, hear you're going to bach it this winter," someone said. The boy only nodded, for once refusing to respond to a chance to talk. "Likely to get pretty lonesome up there all alone."

"Yup. . . . But—for gosh sakes," brightening in a forced sort of way, "if you want to know what bein' lonesome is, you'd ought to be alone in Detroit once!"

BUSY days, those of the exodus, and then it was over, with summer homes boarded up, and the town settled down for the quiet monotony of winter.

The Kid gave the boys something to talk about during those rainy days in mid-September which usually precede a wonderful Indian summer. They sat by stoves, and speculated about him and his relationship to Wayman, when he was not among them; when he was present, he became an object for open ridicule. He seemed not to mind this in the beginning. Many of the gibes appeared to pass completely over his head, and because of this the taunts became more brutal, the feeling against him stronger.

He was subject to this harassing only at evening, though. He had nothing to do at the Wayman house now, it seemed, and so he had leisure to go with the fleet.

He was out every day, usually with Ezra Graham in his stanch "Kittiwake." And for once, Ezra reported, the Kid seemed to forget his Detroit for long intervals. He liked boats, knew boats, had a sailor's sense of weather and the strategy of meeting savage water.

Of course, when the matter of lifting nets or setting dry twine occupied the crew and the day was quiet, the Kid's interest was less steadfast, and then he took occasion to tell how much more wages a man could make in Detroit with the same labor. Or he talked about the size of the General Motors building, or the wealth of Henry Ford.

THE crew grew tired of him, and used to complain about his regularity in going out; but Ezra seemed to find a sort of amusement in the boy. More, perhaps he detected something beneath the lad's verboseness, because he took pains to make the Kid happy by teaching him the handling of a boat and the whims of the lake. He even let the Detroit Kid bring the "Kittiwake" into the piers under a nor'wester.

Now, making those piers with a heavy sea running in and the river current grabbing a boat's bottom is no simple process. It means quick and accurate work. Often the wheel is too slow to permit negotiating the forty-foot channel with safety, and for that reason all the tugs in our fleet are equipped with long tillers.

These tillers lie along the little stern decks, the only exposed decking of the craft, which are otherwise snugly housed from stem aft. The tiller is not in the way for the work of setting nets, and when a sea is running the skipper can stand out on that open bit of deck, have a fine view of the channel over the housing, which hits a man standing there about breast-high, feel every move of his boat, and put his rudder hard over with a shove of a foot on the tiller, in a fraction of the time it would take to do it by spinning the wheel.

The Kid had watched Ezra run home several times, and he certainly would get wide-eyed, watching the process. Then, one day, Ezra asked him if he would like to try.

"I'll tell a man!" the Kid cried out, and clambered out of the housing to the stern.

Ezra was there, of course, in case the boy misjudged. But he did not. He caught her up as a roller attacked the quarter just when the river current gripped her, (Continued on page 125)

Adventures Of A BARGAIN HUNTER

By Mildred Harrington

I HAVE bought everything from corned beef to necklaces of real pearls, for clients scattered from Alaska to Yucatan, and from Paris to Pekin. I have outfitted, literally, thousands of babies and brides, and I always have on my books quite a flock of bachelors, not to mention a sizable sprinkling of married men. Several of my masculine customers rely upon me to buy pretty nearly everything for them, even to their ties, razor blades, and winter underwear. But thus far, thank goodness, only one of them has entrusted to me the job of picking out his wife!"

The woman who made these statements to me was Mrs. Leila Leeds. For thirty years, Mrs. Leeds has been a professional shopper in New York City. That is, she makes her bread—and a little butter too—by filling orders for people who want the thrill of knowing their things come from New York, but who haven't the time, the money, or the inclination to do their New York shopping in person.

"Quite often, though," she explained, "I simply make the rounds of the stores with out-of-town clients who wish to have the advantage of my experience when they go on a shopping spree.

"There are professional shoppers, or purchasing agents," Mrs. Leeds told me, "in practically every large city in the United States but, naturally, the lion's share of them live and work in New York. At present there are about one hundred and twenty women here who give their entire time to this work. All told, we fill hundreds of thousands of orders annually, making a total volume of business that runs into more than five million dollars."

Since she began to make a business of shopping, Mrs. Leeds has come into more or less intimate contact with well over twenty thousand customers. And what she has learned about folks—their likes and dislikes, their little personal idiosyncrasies, and vanities, and their surprising capacity for giving trouble and joy—would make a professor of psychology sit up and take notice.

"Hundreds of patrons whom I've never seen," she proudly declared, "sign their letters to me 'Affectionately yours,' 'Devotedly,' or 'With much love,' just as if they were writing to an old friend. And indeed they are! Some of the sons and daughters of my first clients call me 'Aunt Leila.' In many instances, I bought their baby clothes and their wedding clothes, and now I am buying things for their youngsters. Is it any wonder that many of these 'children' feel like my very own?

"THERE is one family out in Minnesota who couldn't be any closer to me if they were my blood kin. I've never laid eyes on them to this day, but I helped raise those youngsters!

"The mother had been one of my brides. After her marriage to a Minnesota wheat farmer, she ordered things from me from time to time. Fifteen years ago, her sudden death from pneumonia left her bewildered husband with five small children on his hands, ranging in age from two months to eleven years. There were no relatives west of the Mississippi and no neighbors within miles of the big, isolated farm. The poor dazed father wrote me a long pathetic letter. 'And so, dear Mrs. Leeds,' he finished. 'you are our only hope.'

"In the face of such faith as that in an utter stranger, there was only one thing I could do: And that was to buckle down and help that man mother his family.

"At first, I sent mostly infant food and nursing bottles. Then, as winter came on, I sent clothes and books and toys to see the children through the long months when they would be snowed in. A special Santa Claus box went at Christmas. In the spring, I shipped more clothes for everybody and, in addition, a saddle and some new harness for the father of the family.

"About once in every six months, I would get a long letter from the head of the house telling me how much each child had grown, how many teeth the baby had cut, what the prospects were for a good wheat crop, and a lengthy and detailed list of the things he thought were needed in the household. He invariably ended with this sentence: 'Buy anything else you think we've got to have in order to remain civilized; but don't forget I'm no bloated New York plutocrat!' While the children were young, his bill with me usually ran between four and five hundred dollars annually. And those youngsters had pretty nice things, too.

"This went on for years.

"IN THE meantime, I was writing fairly regular letters to the little daughter, who at eleven years of age began to try to take her mother's place. I sent her simple patterns and beginners' lessons in sewing. I even sent her wholesome recipes, with which she and the Swedish woman of all work wrestled earnestly. And I wish you could have tasted the spiced grapes that child put up when she was only thirteen!

"When the children were big enough to go away to school, I chose their clothes and I helped select the schools to which they were sent. Now the eldest two girls are married to fine men and have babies of their own. And although one of them lives within easy motoring distance of a large city, and the other in a good-sized hustling Mid-

An Expert Gives You Some Shopping Hints

MRS. LEEDS has been a professional shopper for thirty years, and here are some of the first-hand maxims she has evolved from her own experience:

"If you like the first thing you see and it comes within your price limit, buy it. Nine times out of ten, further shopping will simply confuse you and make you dissatisfied.

"Cultivate one clerk in a store or department. She will soon learn your requirements in her field, and will, therefore, save your time and your temper.

"In a town of any size, each of the larger stores is likely to carry some special line in which it excels. For example, one shop may have a particularly attractive line of piece goods; another may specialize in novelties and gifts. And so on. Find out what specialties the stores in your community offer—and use your knowledge.

"Don't be too ready to buy 'bargains.' Remember that bargains are of two classes: cheap goods bought and sold at low prices in order to stimulate trade during a dull season, and regular stock which is to be sacrificed rather than carried over. Only in the latter class will you find any real bargains, and even here you will have to be careful not to load up on shop-worn goods."

Western town, I still do their 'best' shopping for them. It might interest you to know that the eldest girl's little daughter is named Leila Leeds!"

Most people, according to Mrs. Leeds, are almost embarrassingly grateful for any little extra trouble she takes to fill an order, or to do them a special favor. Of course there are always some individuals who are inconsiderate, simply because they are thoughtless; but there are very few persons who are deliberately selfish or ungrateful.

"In all my experience," said Mrs. Leeds, "the palm for actual rudeness goes to a woman in a small town not very far from New York. Several years ago, this woman sent me a ten-dollar bill and a shopping list about a yard long. At the end of the letter which accompanied her order, she said, 'And if you have any old fashion books from which my little girl could cut paper dolls, I wish you would send those along with the other things.'

"I must have walked ten miles in filling that order. At any rate, I know that I spent the better part of a week in combing every big bargain basement in town. And, eventually, by some miracle, I found all the articles her list called for and at the prices specified. And I did not forget to include a batch of fashion books for the little girl.

"IMAGINE my chagrin several days later, when I received a chilly note from my new client informing me that she could have done much better at home. In fact, she said in so many words that I had simply wasted her money because I had been too lazy to look around. She added that when she bought through a professional shopper that she expected to get bargains. And she didn't even mention the fashion books which I had been at such pains to beg from my friends for her!

"But don't forget," warned Mrs. Leeds, "that this incident stands out because it is the exception to the general rule.

"Frequently, when I get home in the evening—often after my family has had dinner—some member of the household will ask sympathetically, 'Did you have a lovely day?' Sometimes I reply, 'No, but I had a profitable day.' At other times, I say, 'Yes, I had a lovely day, but it wasn't a very profitable one.'

"Whether or not it is profitable, Monday is nearly always a happy day for me, for it is on Mondays that I usually shop for week-end gifts. The story of how I came to be a specialist in this field records one of the tenderest and most beautiful experiences of the many that have come my way in thirty years of shopping for other folks.

"A little over a year ago, a North Carolina man wrote me a letter which ran about like this:

Last week, my wife had a birthday. It gave me quite a shock yesterday when I realized that I had let the occasion pass without even mentioning it. I just plain forgot. We have been married four years, and I love my wife far more than I did on our wedding day; but I am ashamed to say that I don't pay her a tenth of the little attentions that I used to give her as a matter of course. Why, when I was courting, I sent my girl candy and flowers every week. Now she's lucky if she gets something for the house at Christmas. This isn't right. I know it isn't, and I want to do something before it is too late. And, say, I have a bully plan if only you will help me put it through.

I know there won't be much in this for you; but do you think that, in making your regular rounds of the shops, you could pick up some little present for my wife and mail it in time, so that it will reach her by Friday or Saturday of every week?

I'm not a rich man, and I'm afraid I can't spare more than three dollars a week. What I want is a sort of little surprise package with something pretty inside that she can't use on the kids, or the house, or me.

Mrs. Leila Leeds

Mrs. Leeds smiled a happy little smile. Then, with the gesture of one about to share a delightful secret, she leaned forward and touched me on the arm.

"My friend from North Carolina was all wrong," she declared. "I mean when he said there would not be much in his chore for me. To be sure, there isn't much money in it; but no shopping commission I have ever undertaken has paid me bigger returns in sheer fun.

"I begin looking for week-end gifts early Monday morning, because there are often attractive 'specials' on sale that day. One week, I picked up a gay little scarf that would brighten the dullest frock, or the blackest mood. At various other times, I found a pair of dainty guest towels, a box of frivolous handkerchiefs, a tiny bottle of perfume, and so on.

"HARDLY had the first gift reached its destination when my client wrote me that his wife was simply delighted. 'She's just like a kid the way she watches for the postman,' he said. He added that she was the envy of all her friends, and that he feared he had let the husbands of his acquaintances in for a hard time of it. It is my guess that he let some of them in for the time of their lives!

"In a week or so, I received a letter from a man whom we will call Mr. Martin. He explained that he was a neighbor of my customer who had conceived the gift-a-week idea. He went on to tell me that his wife had been an invalid for twenty-two years. She was rarely ever able to leave her room. Anything to break the tedious routine of her days would be a godsend to her. Would I please put her on my list for a week-end remembrance?

"Of course I would!

"And I wish I could convey to you some notion of the thrills that can be traced to the little parcel which is delivered at the Martins' door each week. The invalid wife has the double thrill of looking forward to her 'surprise package,' and, later, of displaying its contents to all callers. The husband has the incomparable thrill of giving happiness. As for me, I experience the thrill of having a finger in a very delightful pie. And I defy anybody to tell me that shopping for other folks is a dull or thankless job!

"Half a dozen husbands now belong to my week-end club. And the other day the wife of one of them came mighty close to making me join the Ananias club. She telegraphed me to send her by return mail a little beaded bag exactly like the one which had been her husband's gift to her the week before. It seems that her sister was crazy for one just like it.

"Now, I knew perfectly well where there was a whole show case full of those beaded bags at a very special price; but I immediately wired back that I was unable to execute her order. I wasn't going to let that woman know that her husband had paid only two dollars and ninety-five cents for her bag.

"In the course of my long experience as a professional shopper," continued Mrs. Leeds, "I have, naturally, had some strange orders to (Continued on page 130)

The Labrador Doctor

By George W. Gray

PHOTOGRAPHS BY HERBERT THRELKELD-EDWARDS

A STANCH little schooner scudded before the breeze, "westward ho" out of England. Her name was "The Albert," and she was bound for that almost forgotten corner of North America known as the Labrador.

On the schooner's narrow deck, two men were absorbed in a lively game with a ball. It was the last of several that had been fielded into the sea.

As the ball disappeared over the ship's side, one of the players leaped onto the rail, and balancing himself, he shouted to the helmsman, "Tack back and pick me up." Then he dived into the sea. He had to tread water some minutes while the ship put about and finally hauled him dripping from his icy bath. But he had the ball in his pocket, and after he had made a quick change of clothes, the game went on as though there had been no interruption.

This impromptu plunge into the mid-Atlantic is only a passing incident, but to me it is a flash photograph of the character of Wilfred T. Grenfell, a young medical graduate, who was on his way again to the Labrador. There were those back home who said that he was throwing himself away, sacrificing a brilliant career, burying his talents in a frozen wilderness. "But I like it," he protested.

Thirty-five years have passed since "The Albert" carried Doctor Grenfell across the sea to become the only physician on the Labrador coast. They are crowded years, full of deeds of daring and of loving kindness. One can hardly speak of the Labrador as crowded, but there are people scattered all down that rocky coast who proudly tell that they owe their lives to the skill and heroism of the knightly doctor. Many a time he has risked death as he plunged into the blizzard with his medical kit lashed behind a team of dogs, or into the teeth of a Straits gale with his hospital ship. But usually he emerged from the plunge with the ball in his pocket, if I may so paraphrase the Doctor's innumerable victories over disease, accident, poverty and ignorance.

FAR from throwing his career away and burying his talents, Doctor Grenfell has become a world figure. Without a doubt, he is the most widely-known missionary in the world. Hundreds of thousands of people know of Labrador only because of his work there.

Doctor Grenfell's earliest ambition, he told me, was to be a tiger hunter.

Perhaps this was not an unnatural choice of a career, for many of Doctor Grenfell's ancestors won fame as fighters. His grandfather was a celebrated campaigner in India during the days of the Mutiny; an uncle was in command at the siege of Lucknow; and there were numerous other kinsmen in India, who sent home tiger skins, elephant tusks, and other jungle trophies to whet the ambition of a small boy. His father's brother was a captain in the navy; another a distinguished professor at Oxford; and Grenfell's father was head master of Mostyn Hall School, a famous boys' school in Cheshire.

In this school Wilfred Grenfell and his two brothers received their early education, which included daily participation in sports and athletics. As a boy, ranging the shores and marshes of his native River Dee, he learned to live by his rod and gun; and he could out-swim, out-row, and out-box most of his fellows. He learned to skin, cure, and stuff the hides of animals and birds, and accumulated a proud natural history collection. He and his elder brother built their own boat. Indeed, before he was out of his teens, Wilfred Grenfell was quite as much at home on water as on land. If he had been intended for the Labrador life from babyhood, he could not have been given better preparation for it.

"I was eighteen years old and had not decided what to do in life," said Doctor Grenfell. "In fact, I had not even thought of it until the question was put by my father one day. A much-traveled friend from India happened along at this time, and I was sent to consult her as a competent adviser. She relieved me of any idea that I could support myself by tiger hunting; but her advice that I become a clergyman did not seem to offer sufficient counter-attraction.

"ONE afternoon, however, I dropped in at the office of our family physician, and he chanced to show me something that did attract me tremendously, a human brain.

"It was kept in a jar of preservative. The sight of it simply thrilled me. To think that this odd puckered thing was the machine that controlled a man's body! That it could make the difference between an idiot and a genius! It stirred my imagination. I immediately decided to become a physician."

Within a few months the young man enrolled in the London Hospital and University, and subsequently finished his course with two terms at Oxford. During his second year in medical school an incident occurred which to Doctor Grenfell was a turning point. His interest in what later developed into the Labrador mission began in this episode.

"I was returning from an out-patient case one night, and chanced to pass a large tent in which a religious meeting was being held," explained Doctor Grenfell. "I turned in to see what it was like, only to find that a tiresome bore was praying a long oration to the Lord. I reached for my hat and was starting to leave, when the leader of the meeting arose and called out in a bluff, honest voice, 'Now, while our brother is finishing his prayer, let us sing a hymn.'

"That was refreshing, and I sat down, smiling. I did not know the name of the leader. Afterward, I learned that he was Dwight L. Moody, the American evangelist, who was then visiting England. His practical good sense appealed to me so directly that I stayed the meeting through, and it made a profound impression on me.

"I was a communicant in the Episcopal Church, in which I had been reared, but was hardly more than a nominal church member. Moody showed me that underneath the externals of Christianity there was a call to do something personally. Religion was perfunctory because it was too soft, too easy. I resolved to make my religion a mode of life rather than merely a bundle of beliefs, and when I left the tent that night it was with the determination to do the things that I thought Christ would do if he were a doctor in my place."

GRENFELL was not a doctor yet, only a medical student in his second year; but this resolution led to his undertaking mission work in a dismal section of London. He was still active in athletics, and alternated university football with leading boys' clubs, teaching in a slum Sunday-school and doctoring among the poor. Finally, he received his medical degree, and almost immediately came an opportunity to go with a little mission sloop which ministered to the deep-sea fishermen off the east coast of England.

He spent five years in this work, cruising among the hundreds of smacks that trawled and seined the shallow North Sea, healing the fishermen's cuts, setting their broken bones, bringing reading matter and tobacco, leading prayers, and in a hundred ways befriending them.

But in 1891 one of his co-workers returned from Canada, bringing news of the Labrador fishermen. On the whole coast of six hundred miles, there was no physician, no nurse, not even a druggist. The population was mostly Anglo-Saxon, the same stock that had settled the American Colonies. The question was put to Doctor Grenfell, would he consider crossing the Atlantic with a view to introducing among these people the same kind of work that he had established so successfully at home?

"Yes," he answered promptly.

"It was exactly the kind of venture to appeal to my type of mind, and I jumped at it," he explained. "That winter of preparation was great fun. I supervised the remodeling of 'The Albert' to make her more suitable for hospital work, and we put an extra sheathing on her forward hull as a protection against ice. In early June of 1892 we set sail."

Seventeen days later, "The Albert" touched Newfoundland, and after a brief stay sailed north with a native pilot at the wheel. She arrived three days later at the harbor of Domino Run, on the Labrador coast, where the main fishing fleet was anchored.

"Our unexpected arrival created excitement among the schooners," said Doctor Grenfell. "Every masthead ran up a flag of greeting, boats put out hurriedly, and soon we were surrounded by bobbing dories whose occupants wanted to know who we were and why we had come. When it was explained that I was a doctor and at their service—well, there was a rush of cases all day, children as well as grown-ups, for many fishermen take their families along on their summer voyages 'down north.'

"Late that afternoon, I noticed a forlorn figure sitting motionless in a small boat just off our bow. As I stood at the rail looking down, he called up in a hesitant manner: 'Be you a real doctor? Us hasn't got no money, but there's a very sick man ashore, if so be you'd come and look at him.'

"I went at once, and he led me to a poor hut. Inside, a man lay in a wooden bunk desperately ill of pneumonia. A woman was giving him cold water from a teaspoon. Six children huddled in a corner. The hut was paved with pebbles, its mud walls reeked dampness, and the only furniture was a stove and the built-in bunks.

"I gave what treatment I could; but any treatment under those circumstances could be only temporary. A pneumonia case in that miserable hovel seemed foredoomed. Beyond the man was the plight of the big family for which he was the bread-winner.

"I thought of this pitiable case every day as I sailed on along the coast, though heaven knows there were plenty of other cases cropping up continually.

"There was, for example, the poor fellow who had fired a cannon to salute an incoming ship, and blew his two hands off in the premature explosion of the charge. He died of blood poisoning, which need not have developed if he had received proper treatment. A youth came on deck with a lopsided face, grotesquely deformed from the effect of a neglected tooth, which I could remove only by digging into the new growth of bone. Another man had been crippled for years by an ingrowing toe nail, which a few minutes' surgery relieved.

"I CAN never forget my first operation in Labrador. The patient was a large woman who had a tumor on her leg. I told her it could be removed by a simple operation, and that she would feel no pain under the ether. But she shook her head in solemn protest against the anesthetic. 'If the blessed Lord sends pain, us has got to bear it,' she said. When the time came, she appeared accompanied by five husky fishermen. 'I bring these men to set on me, Doctor, and hold me down, so's you won't have to give no ether.' We proceeded accordingly, the operation was successful, and the patient recovered.

"There were many scruples like this in our early years in Labrador. The people are deeply religious, and anything suggesting an evasion of divine providence is regarded as sinful. Eventually, we got them to accept the idea that chloroform is a blessing from God, and now there is no longer any conscientious objection to its use."

Doctor Grenfell treated nine hundred patients on this first cruise, working far north among the tiny Eskimo settlements that face toward Greenland.

A postman of the Far North

One morning in October, he came on deck to find an added crispness in the air. The water line of "The Albert" was marked with a ridge of glistening ice. It was the Arctic's warning that winter was at hand, summer had gone, and ships had better be getting along, too.

He stopped again at Domino Run, remembering the pneumonia patient. There was a new grave, and in the hut a widow and six orphans faced the long winter.

The Doctor was haunted by this case. It seemed to epitomize the whole Labrador problem. He felt that a few weeks in a hospital might have saved this life, and then this woman and these children would not have been left alone. Merely to cruise among the fishing fleets and villages, he saw, would only touch the edge of the job he had tackled. There must be permanent stations, and, first of all, a hospital.

A FEW days later "The Albert" drew into the harbor of St. John's, the capital city of Newfoundland, under which Labrador is governed. News of the Doctor's work had preceded him, and the harbor craft whistled and tooted and waved enthusiastic welcome. The governor called a meeting at Government House to express thanks and assure support, and the meeting was electrified when one of the biggest merchants in the province arose, and said that his firm stood ready to present a building on the coast for use as—a hospital.

"That sealed the venture," said Doctor Grenfell, "and I decided forthwith to return next year and establish the mission on a permanent basis, with a real hospital at Battle Harbor. Before winter was over, a cablegram announced that another mercantile firm had provided a second hospital, at Indian Harbor, two hundred miles farther north. As both places were anchorages for the fishing fleets, they seemed well (Continued on page 102)

If You Want To Slow A Man Down Try Bawling Him Out

"That method," says the head of the Graybar Electric Company, "is guaranteed to put a man in a frame of mind that will prevent his doing any really good work for several weeks!"

By Helen Christine Bennett

DID you actually polish up the handle of the big front door?" I demanded.

Albert L. Salt, president of the Graybar Electric Company, looked startled.

"No; it was the bell," he countered quickly. "It couldn't have been the handle, because it was an old-fashioned one of black iron. I dusted that every morning—but how I polished the bell!

"I suppose in some ways I do resemble the lad in Gilbert and Sullivan's 'Pinafore' who 'polished up the handle of the big front door.' Someone liberally misquoted that song for me once."

With a smile Mr. Salt recited:

"When I was a boy I served a term
As office boy for an electric firm.
I washed the windows, and I swept the floor,
And I polished up the bell upon the big front door.
I polished up that door bell so carefully
That now I am the ruler of the company.

"I'm not the 'ruler' of the company I started with, but, with this discrepancy, I'm bound to admit that the jingle almost fits the facts." He laughed the happy laugh of a man who has worked his way up and who feels that the fight was squarely won. Although Salt has taken work seriously, he has enjoyed it hugely, and he finds plenty of fun in each day as it comes.

"You've traveled a long way," I suggested.

"Yes," he replied; "it's forty-seven years since I first polished that bell on the door of the office salesroom of the Western Electric Company just behind Old Trinity Church. And I've been here," indicating the spacious room in which we sat, "only a few months."

We were in the heart of the new financial district of New York, on the fifteenth floor of what is now the largest office building in the country, the Graybar Building, named for the company which Salt heads. The huge new building is a feature of the city eagerly pointed out by the guides of the tourist buses. Located between Forty-third and Forty-fourth Streets on Lexington Avenue, it stands directly above the tracks of the New York Central and the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroads. By a marvel of engineering, the thirty stories that rise boldly to the skies spring not from a foundation cellar but are supported by steel stilts sunk deep into the rock of Manhattan, and these are sheathed with rubber coverings which act as shock absorbers.

Albert Lincoln Salt is president of the Graybar Electric Company, a huge buying and selling organization formed to take over the supply business of the Western Electric Company

Two years ago, when Mr. Salt was elected president of the newly created Graybar Electric Company, this building was projected, but not assured. He conferred with the builders, and was convinced that the plans were sound from every standpoint. He foresaw that the unique character of the building would bring it widespread publicity.

THE Graybar Electric Company had been created to take over the supply business of the Western Electric Company, which is the largest maker of telephone equipment and electrical devices in the world. Bereft of the support of the name of the parent company, the new organization needed to make itself known. Salt reasoned that if the name "Graybar" could be borne by the largest office building in the world, the new company would gain immediate prestige. He went to the men who were backing the Graybar Company, and proposed that they locate in the new building, and take a financial interest in its construction.

The Graybar Company, however, had just taken a ten-year lease on its quarters, which would have to be disposed of. Moreover, the proposed plans were still speculative; nothing like this building had ever been attempted on this scale. It took all Salt's selling ability to get the backers of the company to the point of consent. But he won out in the end. Immediately, Salt started to utilize the prestige he had gained. Long before the building was complete, people all over the country knew that it was coming. When finally, in the spring of 1927, the company moved to the acre of office it occupies, his foresight had been justified. The name of the new company, coupled with that of the building, was known far and wide.

IN ALL of his forty-seven years of work, Salt has been connected with electrical equipment. The Graybar Company buys and sells almost every conceivable device used in electric lighting or electric power service—wiring, bulbs, machines small and large. It maintains sixty-five warehouses and sales stations in twenty-eight states, and its wares are distributed throughout the entire country. Last year it bought and sold over seventy million dollars' worth of products. It is frankly and unashamedly an efficient and energetic middleman, and Salt glories in the title.

"Within the past ten years," he said, "everybody seems to have had a shillalah out for the Distributor, and used it whenever he could, with the result that hammering the Jobber or the Distributor, loosely termed the Middleman, with little or no thought regarding the economic function he performs, has become a great national pastime. We maintain that the efficient distributor saves money for the manufacturer and for the ultimate consumer, by reducing the cost of merchandise."

In that belief Salt has organized the Graybar Company as a great buying and selling organization, extending to manufacturers the possibilities of reduction of a sales force to a minimum, extending to retailers the comparative knowledge that concentration of sixty thousand items in one catalogue must bring.

When anyone asks Salt why he has succeeded to the post of the presidency of the Graybar Company, he replies:

"I guess it's because I got started right and gave everything I had for forty-five years before I got here."

I passed that question along to Mr. H. B. Thayer, chairman of the board of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, who has known and worked with Salt for forty-five years.

He said, "I'd put it this way: Albert Salt was the best office boy we ever had, the best clerk we ever had, the best salesman we ever had, the best purchasing agent we ever had, and he never knew when the whistle blew."

That, in a nutshell, epitomizes Salt's progress. In every position he has occupied he was the best, not because of exceptional and startling brilliancy, not because of a particular gift in any one direction, but because he did his job well and was no "clock-watcher."

If he has a gift that is God-given, it is his ability to make friends. From the days when he traveled over the country visiting telephone companies and electricians in the hope of selling them new apparatus, to the present, when he sits in his luxurious office in the biggest office building in the country, he has continued to make and hold friends.

Now, even God-given gifts need human direction, so I asked Mr. Salt how he managed to win so many friends.

He looked at me a bit quizzically. "Perhaps," he said, "you in your work have had experience with the man who agrees readily to do something, and then puts it off and puts it off, maybe never to do it at all. Well, I made up my mind that I would not be that kind of fellow. When I'm asked to do something, I either say I can or I can't do it. And if I can do it, I do it then and there, without waiting. If a man, for instance, wants an introduction to someone, I take up the 'phone and make the introduction. I do what is asked when it is asked."

I had already sensed that. I had asked for an interview while Salt was on vacation, fishing in Maine; I got the interview on the day he returned to his office. It was my first experience in seeing the head of a great corporation directly upon his return from a vacation. Salt arrived at his office that morning, cleared his desk, and was talking with me at two in the afternoon.

"Will you tell me something of the days when you polished up the bell?" I asked.

"I'll begin at the beginning," he agreed. With a memory for complete detail that was in itself a revelation, he talked freely of himself and his work. Salt talks readily, giving his attention to what he is saying; but he is without dramatic flourishes. He commands a fine vocabulary and his words are carefully fitted to express his exact meaning. But as you read this narrative you will soon become conscious of two facts: first, Salt remembers the name—middle initials and all—of practically every person with whom he has worked from his school days; and, second, he mentions with profound gratitude everyone who has at any time stretched forth a helping hand.

I am not going to try to describe Salt. He looks, I may say, exactly like his picture. But after he has talked for a few minutes you don't know what he looks like. He has effaced himself, and is entirely absorbed by the matter in hand.

"IT WAS back in July of '81," he said, "that I began. I had just finished a course in Grammar School Number One, in Brooklyn. My principal, Charles R. Abbott, and my teachers, Miss Tracy, Miss Ostrander and Miss Hyde, had done their best for me. The family had decided that I was to become a minister. I hadn't given much thought to the matter. In the summer, I usually went out to a cousin's place on Long Island, and I was looking forward to a vacation. A friend of mine told me that the branch office of the Western Electric Manufacturing Company on New Church Street was looking for an office boy. Work was a new idea, but it had an attractive sound and I discussed the matter with my parents. I was fifteen years old at this time but I was considered only a child, and Father and Mother, and Grandfather and Grandmother, who lived with us, all took the affair to heart and gave it serious consideration. They argued that I didn't even know the streets in New York, which was true; but I couldn't see what harm it would do to try, and I persuaded them to let me apply for the job. My grandfather, who was an architect, and a person of distinction, even traveled to New York to see that the job was all right. You can see that I was anything but an independent character when I started.

"I named my own salary. That is, I was led to think that I had. When I was asked what wages I expected, I said:

"'Four dollars a week.'

"Mr. F. R. Welles, who was manager of the branch office, and to whom I had applied, shook his head.

"'Why, Albert,' he said, 'that is preposterous! I never heard of a boy getting more than two.'

"If I had been a little wiser I might have suspected that he was kidding me, but I replied seriously:

"'I don't see, sir, how I can possibly get along with less than four.'

"He apparently yielded.

"'Well, all right,' he said with heartiness; 'we'll try it.'

"A GREEN office boy is meat and drink to any office, and I was very green. I reported to Mr. W. P. Cleaver, the chief clerk, and listened in some confusion to his explanation of my duties. It seemed I was to be a little of everything. I was to keep his and the other desks and the show cases in first-class order. I was to polish the bells, not only the one on the front door, but those on the sample boards of electric bells and annunciators. I also became a manufacturer of ink compounded of lampblack and castor oil, for Edison's electric pen. After I had been in the office only a few hours Mr. Cleaver called me.

"'Albert,' he said, 'do you know what bills of lading are?'

"'Yes, sir,' I said.

"'Well,' he replied, 'here are a few receipts. I want you to go to the companies named and take out bills of lading in triplicate for them, one for every receipt.'

"I took the pile. There were twenty of them. I went away to a remote corner and sat there, wondering how on earth I was going to accomplish the task. I hardly knew a street in Manhattan. But I sorted out the receipts as well as I could, took my cap and started. I decided to ask my way as I went. How I hustled! Some of the distances between the companies were long; but I took the street car and paid my fare out of my own pocket. I got the twenty bills of lading, and at the end of the day returned them to Mr. Cleaver. When I handed them over, he said:

"'Well, of all the— How many are here?'

"'Why, all of them,' I replied.

"His eyes opened and his mouth too.

"'All of them?' he said. 'Why, it's impossible; you couldn't possibly.' He was running them over as he spoke, and he found them all there.

"'How,' he demanded, 'did you do it?' I told him how. I said that I had paid my car fare and rushed from one place to another to make time. He listened with his eyes popping, then he told me it was all right, and I went away. But not before I heard him say to one of the clerks:

"'Well, of all the— Say, we never had anyone 'round here like this before!'

THIS ROAD IS CLOSED

A Love Story by Elisabeth Sanxay Holding

OAK STREET runs east and west, so that the sun walks down it. A tranquil and pleasant suburban street, it is; nothing has ever happened there. Nothing but birth and death, delight and anguish, victory and defeat, things no more remarkable than the rising of the sun. And nothing happened this day. It was a riotous May morning; a rough little wind was blowing; the sun was up in the bright sky; an enchanting morning, but not one to trust, for sudden clouds drove by, like frowns, and there was a bite in that frolic wind.

Three persons went out of three separate houses on Oak Street that morning. They came back, only a little later than their usual hour, and they would have said, each one of them, that nothing had happened, except that they had come home a new way.

Yet perhaps there is no adventure so strange or so moving as that—to come, by a new way, back to the familiar home, the dear and well-known face. Perhaps nothing in the world is so wonderful as old things, seen by a new light.

In the neat white cottage at the end of the street where the sun came up, Jess was down on her knees among the regiment of boxes in her mother's closet. There was nothing for it but to open each one; here was an old, dusty velvet hat of her own; here, in another box, was a ridiculous little jet bonnet; another box was filled with streaked and faded artificial flowers and bits of old ribbon.

The door swung closed on her heels, and she pushed it back with a crash.

"Can't you remember where you put them, Mother?" she asked, with a sort of desperate patience.

"I'm sure I didn't put them in there, dear," said Mrs. Rivers anxiously. "I was so sure I'd put them in your top drawer."

"You always do put things in here," said Jess, sighing. "All this rubbish that no one will ever want—of course things get lost. I wish you wouldn't bother any more, Mother. Just leave my things; I can do them when I get home."

She was sorry to say that; she knew it hurt.

"I can't help it!" she thought. "I've got to look decent for the office, and I haven't time for this eternal hunting for every little thing. I really don't see why Mother can't just wash out a few stockings and iron a few handkerchiefs, without mislaying them."

"I can lend you a nice handkerchief, dear," said Mrs. Rivers.

"No, thanks. I want my green linen one. Do please, Mother, try to think where you put it!"

Mrs. Rivers sat down on a chair against the wall, and shut her eyes, a look of sternest concentration on her thin face.

"But she's not concentrating," thought Jess. "She can't. Her mind's so undisciplined."

Not for anything in the world would she have said such a thing aloud, though. Crossing the room, she put her arm about her mother's frail shoulders.

"Never mind, darling!" she said. "I can stop and buy a hanky."

Mrs. Rivers looked up into her child's face. Jess was smiling, and she smiled too. But, in her heart, "I'm a muddle-headed old idiot!" she thought. "I'm always forgetting things. I'm old and stupid—and useless."

But she would not say that, to hurt her dear child. They smiled at each other, Jess resolutely stifling any feeling of desperation, Mrs. Rivers gallantly bent upon hiding the fact that she was so old and tired.

"Mercy!" she cried, jumping up. "There's the coffee boiling over!"

THE percolator had boiled over and put out the gas, and the outside of the pot was covered with trickles of liquid and grounds. Jess did so hate anything like that. In haste, Mrs. Rivers took up a cloth to clean it, but the cloth was torn, and her hand came against the hot metal. It hurt horribly.

Mrs. Rivers had no time to be hurt, however. She wound the cloth about her burnt fingers and went on; it was late, and she did so want Jess to start off with a good breakfast. There was a pan of nice little egg muffins in the oven; but she could not get the oven door open with her hand tied up.

"Let me help you, Mother," said Jess, coming into the kitchen with her hat and coat on. Then she noticed the tied-up hand.

"Mother! What have you done?"

"It's nothing," said Mrs. Rivers hastily. "Please sit down, dear."

"Let me see!"

"I tell you it's nothing, dear. Please begin your breakfast!"

"Let me see!" said Jess again, and her voice was stern.

"Goosey!" said Mrs. Rivers, trying to laugh.

"Mother," said Jess, "please don't be a martyr!"

"Jess," said Mrs. Rivers unsteadily; "it's not . . . nice of you to say that."

"It's not nice of you to hurt yourself and not tell me. You know that I want to take care of you."

"I don't want to be taken care of!" cried Mrs. Rivers. "I'm quite old enough to take care of myself."

SHE hadn't meant to belittle all that her dear child did for her, hadn't meant to wound. But she saw by Jess's face that she had done so.

"You see, darling," she said, taking off the clumsy bandage. "It's nothing."

But it was worse than she had realized. Jess ran up-stairs for ointment and gauze, and bound up the injury very skillfully.

"Yes, it does feel ever so much better this way!" said Mrs. Rivers.

Yet she would rather have endured twice the pain than to have seen Jess go off with her breakfast half eaten. When the door closed behind her child, she sat down at the table and stared at the untouched muffins.

"A useless, muddle-headed old woman," she said to herself.

Jess knew that her mother would be thinking something of that sort.

"Oh, dear!" she thought. "Mother's really morbidly sensitive. I can't say a word to her. Now she'll be unhappy all day long! And her poor hand. If she'd only not be so—sensitive!"

She saw by her watch that she would have to hurry for the train. And she hated to hurry, hated any sort of confusion or disorder. Such a bad beginning for a day's work!

As she hastened down the street, she saw Jack Griffith come out of his gate.

"Oh! Good morning!" said he.

"Good morning, Mr. Griffith!" said she.

That was all. He went on, ahead of her. He walked faster than she possibly could; very soon his limber, broad-shouldered figure vanished round a corner. But somehow the image of him lingered in her mind, his gray eyes, his engaging smile.

There had been a time, a few weeks ago, when young Griffith had walked to the station with her every morning. Then he had stopped, abruptly.

"It's just as well," said Jess to herself.

What could it profit a girl with her way to make in the world, and a mother to support, to walk in the spring mornings with a young fellow who was just starting in business, and could not afford to think

Illustrated by John Alonzo Williams

"You don't know," said he. "It might do . . . someone any amount of good if you—if you were just there" about anything but business for a long time to come? He was extravagant too, and careless and light-hearted, and a talk with him had the disastrous effect of making all the rest of the day seem gray and tiresome. Yes; it was a good thing that he walked on alone now.

But it would be better still if she never had to see him at all, and could forget his smile, his gray eyes, the things he had said, and couldn't have meant. She went on without a glance at the imposing brick house where he lived.

JOHN GRIFFITH, SENIOR, stood by the window of the dining-room in that house, waiting for the car to take him to the station. He saw his son set off on foot and he knew why the boy hadn't waited. Those bills. . . .

"Ashamed of himself!" thought Griffith. "Well, he ought to be!"

His daughter Nina was still sitting at the table, leisurely finishing her breakfast. And her tranquil, happy air was almost too much for him. Twenty-five dollars for a leather jacket! What did she want with a leather jacket, like an aviator's? Anything to waste money on, she and her brother. Bills, bills, bills! And when he remonstrated, they put on that kind, soothing manner. . . .

"Now!" he exclaimed, "there goes that girl—Miss Lake—Miss Pond—Miss Rivers—there's a girl! Earns her own living."

"She's awfully pretty," said Nina.

"Pretty? That's got nothing to do with it. She's an independent, self-respecting girl, earns her own living."

"I bet she wouldn't, if she could get someone else to do it for her."

"You've no right to say that!" said Griffith severely. "You—"

"It's true!" said Nina. "Any girl in the world would rather have a dear, generous, peevish, darling old Dads like you than go to work in an office and wear a coat three years!"

She had got up and come to his side, and put her arms about his neck. It was sweet to have her so; he loved this pretty, laughing girl of his more than he could have expressed. But he would not be cajoled.

"That's all very well," he said. "But that Miss Rivers—"

He remembered what he had said to his son about Miss Rivers, a few weeks ago.

"You'd better put your shoulder to the wheel, my boy, and make a man of yourself, before you go running after a fine girl like that—wasting her time. What d'you think she'd say to these bills, eh? You can't even keep yourself. Two weeks' salary for a garage bill!"

He had said a good deal more than that. He had told the boy he was no good, that he was an empty-headed, wasteful young ne'er-do-well.

Well, compared with what John Griffith had been at twenty-four, so he was. And compared with her mother, what was Nina at twenty-one? He himself had been a married man at twenty-four, living in a humble little cottage, with that brave, wonderful girl. They had been poor enough, but it had been such a gallant and hopeful sort of poverty.

He had worked, and she had helped him, had cooked and sewed and swept, and helped him most of all by just being alive, by waiting in the doorway with a smile. That smile. . . . If only she hadn't gone! He needed her so; as much now, when he was gray-haired, as when he was young. Even more. Even more. . . .

And she was dead, and he had nobody now. Only these two selfish youngsters, with their bills, their unending demands. Didn't seem possible that they were her children.

"I'm—I'm disappointed in you!" he cried. "In both of you—you'll never know what a disappointment—"

The car had come to the door.

"I've got to go now," said Griffith.

His daughter released him, and drew away. And, glancing at her, he felt a little twinge of pain. After all, she was very young—and somehow so touching, with her curly head, her warmly-colored, sunburnt face, her hurt blue eyes. Yes, she was hurt.

"There, there, my dear!" he said, and patted her shoulder, and kissed her, rather absent-mindedly, and off he went.

As he went out, the door of the small house next door burst open, and a young man came out and ran headlong down the steps.

Griffith opened his mouth as if about to speak, but changed his mind and got into his car.

"No," he said to himself. "No, better not. Clever fellow like that—"

He sighed.

"I've missed all that," he thought. "I've never met a writer. Never see anyone but business men—lawyers—downtown—both my clubs. House always full of those empty-headed youngsters—jazz—radio—so on. Fellow like that young Buller ought to be interesting. But—"

He sighed again.

"MIGHT have offered me a lift," thought young Buller, watching Griffith's car roll out of the drive. "Now I've missed my train."

Still he kept on at a tremendous pace, his face grim, as if he were bent upon escaping, running away from something.

"All right!" he said to himself. "I don't care if I do miss it. And lose my job."

Mr. Griffith's superb car had turned a corner and vanished.

"Good lord!" thought Buller. "There's that man—made a fortune out of iron castings. Iron castings! And look at me! A poor, shabby, harassed devil, running for a train—which I've certainly missed. Intelligent? I'm a fool! Enid was right. Too bad I'm not a carpenter."

Enid had not said that, and he knew very well that she had never thought anything of the sort. But he chose to take it that way. She had only suggested that he might try to get an earlier train home, so that he could put up some shelves in the kitchen for her.

"Sorry!" he had answered, curtly. "It's impossible."

He had had a vision of his desk, piled high with work, with proofs, with unread manuscripts, with unanswered letters. He was assistant editor of a small weekly paper with an admirable reputation; he did a good deal of desk work, and he also wrote articles on international polity and economics. He had already won a name for himself in his own field; but he certainly was not likely to win a fortune.

Enid had not realized in the least what she had done; she had looked a little startled by his curt tone.

"I just thought that possibly you could manage, Hilyard. You see, the carpenter would charge so much, and I do so want a place for those French casseroles."

He had worked late the night before; he was tired; and he was not at any time a very patient man.

"That's all you care about now!" he had cried. "The House! You used to talk. You used to be interested in books, in ideas. But now— You never think of anything but your shelves and your casseroles and your—your House!"

"Well, you see, Hilyard," she had said, in her grave, straightforward way, "I've never had a real home before."

"What of it?" he had shouted. "Who wants a 'real home,' and this—this atmosphere of dishes and pots and pans? Think how it used to be!"

A WAVE of bitterness and regret had come over him. He had remembered the old days, the gay, careless days, when Enid had lived in a studio apartment with two other girls, and he had used to go there for queer little dinners, or he and Enid would go out to some table d'hôte.

And she had been such a wonderful companion, so intelligent and earnest, so pretty in her shabby hats and old dresses. There had been so magical a glamour about those days, her face, seen by candlelight in the studio, or smiling at him across a restaurant table. . . .

"Think how it used to be!" he had cried.

Now, after six months of married life, look at her! In a gingham apron, talking about shelves for casseroles!

"I know," she had said. "But—it's such a dear little house!"

"It's not! It's a jerry-built, stereotyped, vile little house! I'd—I'd rather live in a cellar—with some sort of mental stimulation."

Then he had caught sight of the clock, and, snatching up his hat, had hurried off. And, just outside the door, he had had a sort of vision of Enid, standing there, so straight, like a forlorn little soldier who mustn't resent or explain anything. He had to go back.

He had caught her in his arms and kissed her.

"Good-by!" he had cried angrily. "You know I love you, anyhow."

Half way down the path, he had had to go back once more.

"Enid!" he had said, "I didn't mean—I mean—"

He didn't know what he meant. He had held her tight, in a sort of despair, filled with the strangest mixture of tenderness and exasperation; they had clung to each other, silent, because their bewildered young hearts knew no words for the pain they felt. Because she was a woman and he was a man. Because they were two separate human beings, who had lived a little lifetime before ever they had met and had come together, each with a thousand qualities—prejudices, virtues, and failings, all developed. And now, after six months, they faced the truth, that she was she, and he was he; and they were different. And it hurt them so.

"He doesn't know!" she had thought. "I wanted so to make him happy. Oh, Hilyard! Oh, my home, my poor, darling little home!"

"That's all you care about now!" he cried. "The House! . . . You never think of anything but your shelves and your casseroles and your—your House!"

"She doesn't understand," he had thought. "I suppose no woman ever does understand what a man's work means. I shouldn't have expected so much."

But he had expected so much. He had expected that life with Enid would be the gayest, most gallant adventure, a thing still touched by the glamour of candlelight. And it was not so.

He thought of that spotless little house, that was like a hundred others; he thought of Enid, whose magic was vanished now, Enid who wore a gingham apron and sang over her work in the kitchen. He didn't want that life, that brisk, humdrum, cheerful life. His heart ached for the romance that was gone, for the other life he had missed.

THE five-twenty-five from New York was late that evening. When it came into the suburban station the sun was going down; in the western sky a ribbon of gold still lingered, but the rest of the world was blank and gray. And the wind was coming up from the sea, a rough spring wind that blew a little chill into the faces of the belated passengers as they descended.

Buller was the first one up the steps, because it was his habit and his nature to hurry. When he reached the street, he glanced up and down, with a preoccupied frown on his lean face; then, turning up the collar of his shabby overcoat he set off, head down against the wind.

It had been a hard day; everything had gone wrong; he was tired and dispirited.

"If we could go out to-night," he thought, "go to some little restaurant where there'd be music. But no! Of course Enid'll have something all ready in her confounded casseroles. Never wants to go out. And I'm so tired! . . ."

He turned the corner he always turned, strode along the (Continued on page 151)

"I'm a rich man, but—

I Need My Job As Station Agent!"

By Keene Sumner

GO WEST through Pennsylvania and, just before you leave the anthracite coal region you will come to Shamokin—accent on the second syllable, please. It is a big town and a busy one, with forty-five thousand people in the borough and its suburbs.

I have met only half a dozen persons among all these thousands. Yet if I should meet them all, I am sure I should not find another man among them as extraordinary as George J. Higgins.

He is not only unique among Shamokinites; but, so far as I have discovered, he has no parallel anywhere else.

Do you know of any man who, although he has become rich, still continues to be a railroad station agent? I doubt it—unless the man is George Higgins. He is the only one I have heard of.

It is rather odd too, that he loves his title of station agent, but that he hates to be styled a wealthy man.

"But you are wealthy, aren't you?" I asked.

"Well," he conceded reluctantly, "I own property worth more than a million and a half. But I don't feel like a rich man, I don't act like one, and I don't want to be called one!"

"Still," I persisted, "you're glad that you are one?"

"Sure I am! But I have less pride and pleasure in that than in being the station agent of the Reading Railway right here in Shamokin! Next to my home, the place I love best in all the world is my little office, up-stairs in the Reading depot.

"I know people think I'm queer because I don't give up that work. Some of the young fellows in the railroad's employ even grumble a little. 'Higgins don't need the job,' they say. 'Why won't he quit and give somebody else a chance?'

"They don't realize that nobody needs that job as much as I do. For the salary it pays me? Of course not! My wife and I give away that much—and more—every year, although we don't advertise the fact.

"I love the job because I made it what it is; because I have held it for nearly thirty-seven years; because it has brought me an army of friends; and because, so long as I hold it, I belong in the Reading 'family.' If I got out of it, I'd be as lonesome as a cat without a home to go to.

"People talk about my 'other interests.' Yes, they are interesting. But my job as station agent is part of my life! If I am sick and my wife keeps me at home for a day or two, I fret to go back to the office.

"'My work is my medicine!' I tell her.

"The minute I get to my office at the station, with the trains rumbling past, the engine whistles blowing, and men coming in for instructions, I begin to pick up.

"I'll be sixty-three years old next July. When I'm seventy, the age at which employees are automatically retired, I'll have to quit whether I want to or not. If I live that long—well, I won't live much longer. That's certain. I'll stop! Like a watch without a mainspring.

"Just having money doesn't keep you alive. But having work that you love—gosh! I tell you there's nothing like it!"

Here's a Lucky Man Who Knows When He Has Enough

"THE greatest happiness money has brought me," says Mr. Higgins, "is this: I have been offered dozens of promotions, but I can afford to keep on being the station agent in Shamokin. In other words, I can afford to keep the job I love, live in the town I love, and be close to the families and friends I love. So far as I am concerned, I don't want anything better than that."

Coming from George Higgins that remark is not to be sneered at, for he knows what work means. He ought to; he has been hard at it for almost fifty-five years. Figure that out and you'll find that he began when he was eight years old.

He was living then in the coal-mining town of Tamaqua, where he was born. At that time, his father was a molder. But with wages far less than they are to-day, and with a rapidly growing family—eventually there were thirteen children in all—it was no easy job to make both ends meet.

In those days, boys in that section began to work in the mines as soon as they were big enough to sit astride a chute and pick slate out of the passing stream of coal. 'Breaker boys,' they were called; and George Higgins became one of them when he was only eight years old.

"I worked in the Hauto colliery, about nine miles from Tamaqua," he told me. "And my wages were two dollars and forty cents a week."

Incidentally, I might add that when he said this, we were on our way to the country club, in his motor-car, with a chauffeur on the front seat! The station agent and ex-breaker boy didn't seem to be impressed by this detail, but I couldn't help making a mental note of it.

"I used to get up at two-thirty every morning," he went on. "So did my father and mother and the three children who were older than I was. We had our breakfast by lamplight. Then we all went out into the country and collected milk, butter, and eggs from the farmers.

"When we got back to town, about six A. M., my mother and my sisters took the stuff around to the dealers who sold it; and my father, two older brothers, and I went to our work.

"I had to ride the nine miles on an open railroad truck no matter what the weather was. Nowadays, the companies take their men back and forth in closed cars—but not when I was a boy

"AFTER a twelve-hour day at the breaker, I rode back to Tamaqua on the truck, reaching home about seven o'clock. Then I had my supper. And after supper my father would give us our lessons to do before we could go to bed. I didn't attend school, except when the mines were shut down and during the cold winter months.

"The family had it pretty hard in those days," he said reflectively "Later, when we moved to Shenandoah, my father went into the shoe business and did pretty well. But we older children learned the meaning of hard work and hardship. And yet—well, I like to look back on that time! It kind of makes you feel as if you had earned the right to live. There's a lot of satisfaction in knowing that you could fight and not get licked. Folks who have it too soft and easy never know how much grit they've got, or whether they have any grit at all.

"Every penny I earned I handed over to my father; and as long as I lived at home I continued to do this. Afterward, when I was working in other towns, I kept only enough for my living expenses. The rest I sent to my father.

"When the time came that he didn't need it for the family, he started a savings account for me. Until the very day before I was married, I used to send him every dollar I could spare, although I was a grown man then, almost twenty-six years old.

"Maybe I never would have had as much as I've got now, if it hadn't been for the money my father put by for me. It came in very handy later on.

"If I hadn't had it, I couldn't have made my first investment. I found that if I had saved some money, people were willing to lend me more. And I wasn't afraid to borrow it, because I had learned that by saving I could pay off the debt. You'll see how this worked out.

"AFTER we moved to Shenandoah, another coal-mining town, I got a job as messenger for the Philadelphia, Reading and Pottsville Telegraph Company. I was fourteen years old and my pay was six dollars a month.

"Up to that time, I had been working in the mines. But my second oldest brother was killed in an accident; and my father said then that he would never again allow one of his boys to work in a coal mine.

"I just loved my new job from the very beginning! Before I became telegraph boy, I had taken lessons in penmanship. That wouldn't be so important now, with everybody using a typewriter. But fifty years ago it was a decided advantage to a boy if he could write a good hand. For a while I was chief clerk and operator at Shenandoah, with a salary of about five dollars a week. I had to be on duty from four A. M. to eleven P. M.; but that didn't bother me. I was just like I am now—rather be at the station than anywhere else.

"I was shifted around from one town to another; sometimes as chief clerk, sometimes as station agent. Finally, thirty-six years ago, they sent me here to Shamokin.

"The place wasn't half as big as it is now; but, even so, the railroad wasn't getting as much business as it should. There were two other roads, and competition was fierce. The job was such a hard one that the station agent had been changed five times in the two years before I came.

"I didn't intend to be the sixth failure! But I had my own notions about the way to make good. There were half a dozen employees who were to work under me, and I called them together the morning after I got here.

"'Now, boys,' I said, 'I don't know a thing about this station; and I don't want to know a thing about it for the next two or three weeks! You've been here some time. You go on with the work, and don't come to me about anything, unless you have to, until I'm ready.'

"Then I got hold of the man who had been special officer at the depot for years.

"'See here, Jim!' I said. 'You know everybody in town. If you don't, you ought to! Take me around and introduce me.'

"DAY after day, we went from store to store and from office to office. I met every business man in Shamokin. I said to each of them: 'I have come to this town to represent the Reading Railway and to be of service to you. If I can do anything for you, please let me know.'

"When I had finished this part of my program, I started to study the work itself. I wanted to serve both the railroad and the community. Yes! And the people who were going to work under me! So I started to build up an organization that would be efficient and loyal.

"If I do say it, that's what I have succeeded in doing. I've trained some fine boys here. Girls, too, for that matter. They stick by me; some of them for years.

"A while ago, when I had a long sick spell, I thought maybe I ought to quit the job, but the officials wouldn't let me. They said I had made my organization so efficient that it could run without me until I was able to take full charge again.

"That doesn't sound as if I had slighted my work for the railroad, does it? I don't want you to make any mistake on that point. The railroad, and my family, always come first with me.

"As for the family, I was thinking of that, even when I was a boy in Shenandoah, going around with a girl named Julia M. Tobin, whom I hoped to marry some day. If I ever should have children, I didn't want them to work as hard as I had in the coal mines.

"Not that the work had hurt me! I grew up strong and husky. But you know how it is: We like to give our children more than we have had ourselves. I guess that isn't very wise either, but it's human nature.

"ANYWAY, I was always looking for a chance to earn extra money on the side. A lot of men could do that, if they weren't afraid of work. I wasn't! So, in addition to my regular job, I used to act as agent for the express companies.

"As there wasn't enough express business in those little mining towns to enable the companies to keep a man on salary, it was done on a commission basis instead. Here at Shamokin I didn't get much out of it at first; only fifteen or twenty dollars a month. But even that was a big help: Added to my railroad pay of seventy dollars (Continued on page 113)

Houdini—
The Master Magician

His early hardships, the beginning of his fame, and the explanation of some of his tricks

THE baby who was to be Harry Houdini was born in the little town of Appleton, Wisconsin, April 6th, 1874, the son of Dr. Mayer Samuel Weiss, a rabbi, and his wife, Cecelia. He was named Ehrich. He was the fifth child, and others were to follow. When Ehrich was born, Doctor Weiss and his wife were newly settled in Appleton, whence they had come from Hungary. Doctor Weiss and his wife both were members of cultured and prosperous Jewish families living in the city of Budapest.

Ehrich was a strong, happy baby. His mother always insisted, in later years, that he never cried. Only one characteristic gave her a little uneasiness—he slept barely half as much as had her other babies. At times when the average well-ordered infant would be deep in slumber, young Ehrich would lie in his crib, awake and content, for long periods, his bright steel-blue eyes roving curiously from one object in the room to another.

The self-sufficient baby developed into a fearless small boy possessed of as much overflowing energy and endless curiosity about the world as an eager, darting terrier. His roving curiosity and lack of fear gave his parents frequent concern.

It was inevitable that locks should have received his early attention. Lock-picking had its advantages as well as satisfying his desire to know how things were done. His mother, for reasons obvious to any mother of a large brood, kept a substantial lock on the cupboard that held her apfelkuchen and tortes. Though the lock gave no signs of having been tampered with, sweets began to disappear with annoying regularity. Circumstantial evidence developed to attach the thefts to Ehrich. Mrs. Weiss reinforced the defenses of the cupboard with a large padlock, but within a few days the mystery of this device was also solved and bits of pastry continued to vanish.

To the end of his days, by the way, Houdini's devotion to pies persisted. On his last Sunday at home in New York, before the final tour from which he never returned, Mrs. Houdini made for dinner two strawberry pies, of which he was particularly fond. She, too, kept a lock on her pie closet—not to keep out Houdini, for no lock was too complicated for him—but for other domestic reasons. They went for a walk in Central Park in the morning, and as they promenaded her wifely instinct detected in Houdini's pleased yet placating manner some unconfessed mischief. Just before dinner she discovered the peccadillo. One of the pies was gone. On the empty plate lay Houdini's visiting card.

But the great delight of Ehrich as a small boy was in magic. A traveling circus came to town in one of his early summers, and along with several other adventurous youngsters he managed to slip under the canvas. Wandering about among the sideshows he came upon a conjurer producing bunnies, flags, long streamers of ribbons, flowers, omelets, from an inexhaustible silk hat, and making cards and coins appear and disappear in the air. Immediately, the fat woman, the living skeleton, the elephant, and even the acrobats were forgotten completely, and Ehrich parked himself in front of that man of simple guile, staring absorbedly at his manipulations of wonder. When he did not return for supper, his anxious family began making inquiries, and Rabbi Weiss found him finally, round-eyed, between the conjurer's knees, being initiated into the mysteries of making a dried pea appear under any one of three cups. He had to be taken home by force.

THEREAFTER, when a circus came to town, Ehrich made straightway for the dusty platform where the "peerless MYSTERIARCH of Three Continents," or "The Wonder-Working Wizard of the World" performed his homely mysteries to the accompaniment of crude patter. Neither circus guards, nor watchful town constables, nor parental threats could keep him from these shows. He began early to practice card palming, coin materialization and the simpler sleights he had observed.

The Weiss family had so many boys that they were a gang in themselves; but Theodore—"Dash"—was his brother Ehrich's most devoted follower. Together they practiced the balancings and stretchings and jumps of the clowns and acrobats that also were a matter of great admiration to the ambitious Ehrich. But Ehrich could surpass Dash's utmost endeavor, for he had a limberness and quickness and loose-jointedness that gave him an unfair advantage in contests. In the matter of rope-escapes he could beat them all, too. Boy-fashion, the gang cherished all scraps of rope, and in his visits to the circus lots the future "Escape Wizard of the World" picked up a variety of ingenious rope-ties from the good-natured canvas men.

MEANWHILE the Weiss family grew steadily larger, but the Weiss income smaller. Doctor Weiss's little classes in Hebrew and his rabbinical services, taken together, brought in but a pittance. Under the circumstances, Ehrich—at the age of six or seven—began to hunt odd jobs. He was fond of telling, in later years, how, as a newsboy, he had sold copies of the first issue of the Milwaukee "Journal," and, as a bootblack, he had on one proud occasion polished the shoes of the governor of the state.

At the age of nine, came Ehrich's big thrill. Jack Hoeffler's Five-Cent Circus came to town, and the lad applied for a job as performer. The manager let Ehrich show him his tricks. They suspended Ehrich head downward from a rope and saw him pick up pins with his eyebrows. He let them tie him up with ropes, from which he speedily managed to free himself. Ehrich was engaged, and thus, at the age of nine, started his professional career. During the few days that Hoeffler's Circus stayed in Appleton he was in heaven! Of course he wanted to go off with the circus when it left town, and of course his parents refused.

Ehrich hung about the shop of the local locksmith in Appleton so much that finally the man gave him a job. He was then eleven years old. In a few weeks he was able to pick every lock in the place, and he fashioned out of a bit of wire a little picklock which could master any fastening apparatus with which he came in contact.

The town sheriff entered the shop one day with a gigantic prisoner in tow. The man had been arrested on some complaint, but had been discharged by the justice for lack of evidence. When they had come to unlock the handcuffs the key could not be found, so the sheriff had brought the discharged prisoner to the locksmith to have the iron bracelets filed off.

The locksmith filed away for a time at the tough steel. It was a hot day. Sweat streamed down the old fellow's face. The sheriff yawned. "Jim, let the kid work on them things for a spell, and you come out with me and git a glass of beer." There was nothing criminal in getting a glass of beer in those days, and the locksmith went.

Ehrich had been staring at the stranger with the fascinated attention always bestowed by small boys on lawbreakers and other heroes. The man scowled at Ehrich silently.

The minutes rolled on while Ehrich worked and sweated, but the file made little impression in his inexperienced hands. The man grew more and more restless.

Ehrich had a sudden idea.

"Wait a minute," he said, and fished out of his pocket a tangle of string and bits of metal and other miscellany, and finally his picklock. The man was watching every move of Ehrich's fingers with unwavering intentness.

A minute later one cuff fell off, and the second quickly yielded. Then Ehrich stepped back hastily and shoved the picklock back in his pocket, while the man rubbed his wrists and stared at the boy thoughtfully.

What idea was gathering under the man's thatched skull Ehrich never knew, for at that moment the sheriff returned and the man was told to clear out.

He was probably the only man who ever was able to watch Houdini opening a handcuff.

AFTER a time the locksmith went out of business and Ehrich again sold newspapers, blacked shoes, and did other tasks which no longer interested him. He wanted to go off into the world; but he knew this project would be vetoed if he placed it before his father and mother. He pondered over the matter for many weeks.

A serious conversation with his father on Ehrich's twelfth birthday reënforced the boy's resolution to set forth to seek his fortune. Doctor Weiss had been greatly impressed by the mature sense of responsibility shown by this son and by his deep-rooted tenderness for his mother. "Ehrich, I am getting to be an old man," he said. "Promise that, if anything happens to me, you will see that your mother never comes to want."

Ehrich solemnly promised, and to him that pledge always remained a consecration. A few weeks later he took the first step toward fitting himself to carry out his vow. He vanished from Appleton, leaving no message behind, for he took no chances on being followed and brought back. Several days—days of frantic uneasiness in the Weiss household—elapsed before his mother received a postcard from the wanderer. "Dear Ma," he wrote, "I am going to Galveston, Texas, and will be home in about a year. My best regards to all. Your truant son, Ehrich Weiss."

In his later years Houdini could throw no light on why he had fixed upon Galveston as a destination.

Ehrich set out on a sunny morning with no possessions save the clothes on his back. Partly on foot, partly beating his way on a freight train, he came in the afternoon to the little town of Delavan, Wisconsin.

A HOUSEWIFE, Mrs. Flitcroft, responding to a knock upon her door, found a very ragged and dusty small boy, who inquired if he could do some job about the place to earn a meal. Mrs. Flitcroft took him in, fed him, and allowed him to sleep before the fire. While he was sleeping she noticed two big rents in the trousers of this diminutive wanderer. Without disturbing his weary boyhood slumber, she took them off, patched them and cleaned them. In the morning she sent Ehrich on his way, his pockets plentifully filled with food.

When, some years later, Houdini got his first real engagement as a performer, out of his first week's salary he bought a silk blouse for Mrs. Flitcroft and sent it to her with a five-dollar bill pinned upon it. This gift, in the abrupt Houdini manner, was the beginning of a long series of similar remembrances.

After leaving Mrs. Flitcroft, Ehrich wandered on from place to place, sometimes tramping the roads, sometimes taking informal rides on freights. He worked at odd jobs, doing his tricks wherever opportunity offered and taking up a collection from the onlookers He found no ready pot of gold, but he did not starve. At first his course was southward, then pretty steadily east. If Galveston was really his original destination that was soon forgotten.

Sometimes he would come upon a provincial circus or a fair. The resolute little wanderer would seek out some man in authority.

"I am Eric the Great," he would say. "I can let anyone tie me with ropes, and I can get free."

If the man was persuaded to give him a test, he could usually get a brief engagement to exhibit his skill. That was what he liked to do; but any job—delivering packages, watching a baby carriage for a shopping mother, or helping men at work in the fields—was good for the price of a meal. He had abounding courage and resourcefulness, plus good health.

Once, when he was performing at a country circus, a local constable tied him up. After Ehrich had wriggled free, the man pulled from his pockets a pair of handcuffs. "Here, bub," he said good-naturedly. "D'you think you kin git loose from these?"

"Eric the Great" hesitated. He jammed his hands into his pockets. In one he could feel the bit of wire with which he had freed the handcuffed prisoner in Appleton.

"I'll try," he said. "You must let me go off by myself to try."

The constable snapped on the cuffs, while the crowd grinned. "Eric the Great" vanished behind a convenient curtain, and in a few minutes he reappeared, carrying the cuffs opened.

The amazement of the officer and of the rest of the country crowd made a great impression on the boy. "Eric the Great" mused on the possibility of putting on a handcuff-escape act.

About this time he was able to send a little money home and to get a letter from his mother. His father, he learned, had finally given up the struggle in Appleton and had gone to New York to try his luck there. The rest of the family were remaining in Appleton until Doctor Weiss could afford to make a home for them in New York. Ehrich presently made his way to that city and joined his father. The two had not seen each other for nearly a year.

Ehrich helped in his father's little school in New York, for he had learned a smattering of Hebrew at his father's knee. In between helping to teach Hebrew, Ehrich worked as a messenger boy.

While Ehrich was still a messenger, he and Doctor Weiss managed to save enough money to send for the family. In a little flat secured in the upper East Side there was a joyous reunion. They were deplorably crowded, but happy to be together.

After the family arrived Ehrich got his first regular job, as a necktie cutter, and in this he continued for over two years. He was a good worker. Hungry for recreation, he joined the Pastime Athletic Club, and he became an amateur runner, winning medals in various junior classes.

But Ehrich purposed to be neither runner nor a necktie cutter. During every spare moment he practiced magic and card tricks and studied the mysteries of locks and rope ties. He was continually astonishing the members of his family and the neighbors with his increasing skill; and after a time such organizations as the Friendly Circle ("entertainment and ball at Schillerbund Hall"), and the Literary Society of the Y. M. H. A. ("special ladies' night") began to include Ehrich Weiss, conjurer, on their programs of home talent. Sometimes, when he confined himself to card tricks, he was billed as "CARDO," sometimes he appeared as "Eric the Great."

IN HIS sixteenth year came a notable event in Ehrich's career. Already the boy had begun to haunt second-hand book shops, pouncing on books on magic and, unless the price was beyond his eager reach, lugging them home as treasure-trove and poring over their secret lore by the hour, until long after the rest of the family were asleep. In one of his prowling excursions he came across a battered volume entitled "Memoirs of Robert Houdin, Ambassador, Author and Conjurer, Written by Himself." At the cost of a few cents, Ehrich went home that evening the owner of the volume.

After dinner he retired to his room with the book and immediately was plunged into a new world of wonder.

He read of secret and complicated mechanisms to control automata which could write messages, draw pictures, or fetch from a miniature shop any kind of pastry or wine, seemingly in response to the conjurer's wand; of ingenious blowpipe arrangements whereby orange trees were made to flower and give fruit in response to the same commanding motion; of complicated rods and hidden shelves to support beautiful ladies, apparently floating through the air in a "trance." Poring over the pages, the excited neophyte found the key to miracles of sleight and illusion that had puzzled him for years, and to many other magical secrets hitherto unknown to him.

This book, written in a free and romantic style, the apparent autobiography of a great magician, has captured the imagination of many others interested in magic; but to no other person, probably, had Robert Houdin seemed such an authentic major prophet as he did to Ehrich Weiss.

When Ehrich's mother got up next morning she discovered him still seated beside his bed, fully clothed, bending over the precious volume. The bed was undisturbed. Through the night he had read with steadily growing enthusiasm. At last he had found the key to the world of wonder which he had been half-consciously seeking since he was a slip of a lad.

EHRICH lost no time in relating to his friend Jack Hayman, who had performed with him at some amateur gatherings, the news of his wonderful discovery. Both boys were thinking seriously of venturing into magic as a career, and for Ehrich the book clinched the argument. Jack said that the addition of the letter "i" to the name Houdin would give the meaning, in French, of "like Robert Houdin." This suggestion struck fire in Ehrich. "I asked nothing more in life than to become, in my profession, like Robert Houdin," he wrote, years later, in recalling the incident. Immediately he adopted that proud name. In later life, when Houdini had become a scholar in his field, he studied fully the life of Robert Houdin, discovered that his early ideal was somewhat of a charlatan, and wrote a book, which he called "The Unmasking of Robert-Houdin."

A few months after the discovery of the memoirs of Robert Houdin, Ehrich abandoned his job as a necktie cutter, and he and his chum Jack Hayman launched forth as professional entertainers under the name of the Houdini Brothers. They performed various feats of magic, including, as their most ambitious feature, the so-called trunk trick. The trunk is concealed for a minute by a curtain, and when it is reopened the original occupant has vanished and in his place his partner is discovered bound in the same fashion. Houdini delighted audiences with this trick to the close of his career. It was not original with him; but he brought it to a stage of development which would have amazed the older magicians.

Houdini's decision to put to the test his ability as a professional magician was strengthened by the death of his father, in 1892. When he felt himself failing, Doctor Weiss summoned Ehrich and bade him repeat his pledge, made on the boy's twelfth birthday in Appleton, that he would always care for his mother. Through his life Houdini observed this pledge in generous measure. Even in his poorest days he always managed to send most of his salary to his mother, and after he won fame nothing was too good for her.

The partnership with Jack Hayman was short-lived. The boys could not agree, so after a few months Houdini substituted his brother Theodore as the other "brother." They played clubs and schools, and entertained at minor social gatherings for a small fee, picking up a precarious livelihood, which they usually had to reinforce by doing odd jobs of a wholly unmagical character.

In 1893 the brothers gravitated to Chicago and filled an engagement at a side-show at the World's Fair, and thereafter Ehrich, as Harry Houdini, "Handcuff King and Escape Artist," appeared for a time alone at Kohl and Middleton's famous Dime Museum, at Chicago, doing twenty shows a day for twelve dollars a week.

At the Dime Museum, Houdini performed his handcuff act, which was his own novelty, and he supplemented this by escaping from a packing box. The latter was not a new trick. Harry Keller had introduced it before American audiences in the seventies. A prepared box with one trick board was used, and with this apparatus—which, by the way, can still be bought from venders of magic—it was easy for any performer of fair agility to mystify simple audiences. In later days Houdini discarded the trick box altogether, and permitted challengers to build their own chests and nail him up on the stage.

Houdini and Mrs. Houdini five years after their runaway marriage

BACK in New York, in the spring of 1894, Houdini played for a time at a beach resort, and at about this time he fell in love, in his abrupt and impetuous manner, and married the girl who was to be his only intimate companion to the end of his days. He was then nineteen, she eighteen. He was a Jew, she a Gentile and a Roman Catholic. It was a runaway marriage, the ceremony being performed by a political boss at Coney Island. Subsequently, two other ceremonies, one Catholic, the other Jewish, were gone through with, out of respect for the beliefs of the two families.

Houdini's mother accepted the young girl as her own daughter immediately, and thereafter the three were inseparable. Beatrice Houdini was not only her husband's comrade in life for thirty-three years, when his death parted them, but she was also his stage partner. The marriage was a beautifully happy one. "I realize that the perfect smoothness of our marriage," says Mrs. Houdini, "was due in large part to my mother-in-law's fine sense of human values and generosity of spirit." Houdini, himself, was the soul of affection.

"Soon after our marriage, when Houdini and his brother were working together at a dance hall in Coney Island, I had a bad scare," relates Mrs. Houdini. "Houdini asked his brother and me to take a walk with him (Continued on page 168)

An Explosion Taught Me How To Live

By Elwin R. Sanborn

FOR twenty-seven years I had been working at one job. It wasn't a monotonous job, for a photographer of wild animals, even those in a zoo, cannot complain that life holds no thrills for him. Especially so, when on occasion he takes to the woods and swamps, and makes pictures of creatures that have never been caught.

Nevertheless, I had drifted into that state of mind which sometimes comes to a man who has been too long without radical change. The ordinary routine tasks I could perform easily, but anything out of the common run tended to upset me. I began to dread the taking of a trip; so much so that I never planned to go anywhere that I did not regret, at the last moment, having made any such plans. I could think of a hundred reasons why I should not leave my daily work. On the eve of leaving it, even for a few days, I was almost overwhelmed with a feeling that I could not possibly get away. There was so much to be done. Or so I felt.

Along with this symptom of nervous fatigue, I developed another—it upset me to meet strange people. Sometimes it upset me to meet my friends. I had a restless feeling when talking to someone, as if I did not have time for such an occupation. Life was almost oppressing me.

But the worst symptom of all was unreasoning fear. A vagrant pain would sometimes throw me into a panic. My pulse didn't seem right to me. I was sure there was something terribly wrong with my insides. If I read any book or article on health, I immediately developed the symptoms described therein. Yet, somehow, these health things fascinated me. I was lured to them, though afraid of them. I had lost my capacity for care-free living; but perhaps others did not know this. Always I was busy, for my work demanded much of me. But I probably thought it demanded more than it actually did.

In short, I had a bad case of agitated nerves. I was a victim of suggestibility. If I strained my back slightly in some unusual exertion, I thought I had incurable kidney trouble. If a pain hit me in the abdomen, it was appendicitis. A little shortness of breath suggested heart disease, or tuberculosis, or something equally as dreadful. Still, I managed to keep right along, no one knowing what weird thoughts flitted into and out of my brain. Perhaps you have had such spells. If so, you will be sympathetic, not denunciatory. There are certain nerveless persons who cannot understand vivid imaginations, and who have no patience with a sufferer from imaginary ills. But ills of the imagination, as I know from bitter experience, are very real, distressingly real.

New York City is perhaps the worst place in the world for a man with mental depression. He feels so alone in the vast crowds. Out at the Bronx Zoölogical Park, where I am the official photographer, editor of "The Bulletin," and some other things, thousands of persons come. I felt apart from them all. They seemed so well, so care free, so happy. They didn't know of the ominous pain that had just hit me, and that undoubtedly was the forerunner to a bad disease!

And a man who lives in New York is always reading of accidents, of men rushed to the great hospitals, placed there alongside of strangers, all the while the families of the injured men remaining in ignorance of their alarming plight. There are even stories of men who fall dead on the streets, and whose families subsequently identify their bodies in the morgue. Gruesome stories. Lurid pictures. How I dreaded the idea of being suddenly hurt and rushed off to some strange hospital there to die amidst strangers! I was careful in crossing streets, too careful. I walked slowly when there was any probability of slipping on an icy pavement. But I must repeat that all of this I kept to myself; foolishly kept it to myself, for had I talked of it, no doubt the unfounded fears would have evaporated. I did my work well. My misery was solely my own.

An Accident Ward Is No Place For Self-Pity

"I HOPE I shall never again be blown up!" says Mr. Sanborn, "even though my first experience of that sort resulted in the most helpful three weeks of my life. But if I should again be the victim of an accident, I trust that I shall have sense and courage enough to tell them to put me into a room with other patients, where I'd have to get well for the sake of those around me! A hospital ward, I discovered when a patient in one, is a place of high courage, of easy friendships, and of quick sympathy. In a miscellaneous ward, human beings are reduced—or elevated!—to a common level, and each one helps the other to get well. A fellow in a ward can't bemoan his fate out loud, can't pity himself too much, lest he hurt the morale of the other patients, or arouse their resentment."

EACH day I came to my office in the Zoölogical Park and worked faithfully there. I liked most of my work. But my real delight came with my home and my garden in Norwalk, Connecticut, from where I commuted daily to the city. I felt at home with home folks, and with flowers. I had a great garden, with many rare plants in it. Eagerly I returned each afternoon to familiar and friendly sights and tasks.

In my office I did some experimenting of a semi-scientific character with photographic plates and the like. My photographs, I thought, were good, for there was always a big demand for them. My mental state never impaired my work. As I have said, I kept it to myself, and under control so far as anyone could judge.

In one of the rooms where I work, my photographic dark room, I had a cabinet set against the wall. A sort of unattached closet, it was. On the shelves in this cabinet I kept various acids and other chemicals for use in my work, and also my flashlight powders. Some of my prints were curling, and I was experimenting with various preparations to preserve them and keep them flat. This task was especially interesting to me.

One morning I set myself to solve the problem of the curling prints. I went to the cabinet, mounted a sort of low step-ladder searching for glycerin on a high shelf, catching hold of the shelf to steady myself. In some way I momentarily lost my balance, and in clutching the shelf toppled the cabinet over toward me.

I tried desperately to right myself and the cabinet, but it was too much off balance. As it fell forward, pinning me under it, I was bombarded with rattling cans and crashing bottles, followed by a terrific explosion that almost blew me free from under the cabinet. I was in a panic, and rightfully so this time. A second explosion followed. My face burned like fury. My body burned. I felt sharp objects penetrating the skin in many places.

Somehow, I wriggled from under the trap, got up and staggered out of the inferno of smoke, acids, and flame. Other office workers from down-stairs were rushing to me, for the explosions had startled them. I heard someone urging me to sit down. I was in terrible pain. I wanted to souse my head and hands in cold water, but knew better than to try that, dazed though I was. Up-stairs, the fire was extinguished, while I still sat in a daze and in agony. The clanging of an ambulance bell outside roused me a little. I was lifted into the ambulance, and rushed off to Fordham Hospital.

THE thing which I dreaded had come to pass. I was the victim of an accident, and was on my way to a strange hospital ward, there to die, as I firmly believed, amidst strangers. To me it seemed the threshold of the morgue.

The doctors and nurses worked skillfully with me. I was still vaguely conscious. One doctor lifted my eyelids, and I heard him say, "A miracle! You can thank God for that. Your eyes are not injured!" I'll never forget him, it was Doctor Walsh; his optimism under the distressing circumstances impressed me; I realized deeply his friendliness.

They found the skin all burned from my hands and forearms and from my head and face. They found holes in my legs, blown there by fragments from the explosion. They bound me in petroleum jelly bandages until I must have looked like a newly wrapped mummy. Then they rolled me on a stretcher car into the public accident ward, for there was no private room available. I wanted a private room, where I could suffer and die in decent seclusion. My wife, who had been informed, wanted me to have a room all my own. The Zoölogical Park authorities would have provided me with a room, even if I could not myself have afforded one.

But there was no room, and so into the ward I was taken. Through a small opening in the bandages I could see the rows of beds. Miserable! Oh, how miserable I was! I dreaded hospitals at best. Now it seemed I was to be chucked into a miscellaneous bunch of accident victims, none of whom, probably, had any cultural background in common with me.

I sensed a little quickening of interest among other inmates of the ward. I was a "new man;" I was a break in the dreary days for them. A big, red-faced man, who had been hit over the head with an iron pipe in a fight, and whose mind, I learned later, had been temporarily affected, sat up in his bed, with the sheet held in front of him like a screen. He gave me a terrified glance, shouted "Good night!" and quickly lay back down, pulling the sheet over his head to hide the apparition. And I dimly realized that I was the thing he feared.

They rolled my stretcher beside a bed, and gently lifted me from the one to the other. Then, in that mysterious, fearsome way of hospitals, the stretcher noiselessly disappeared and I was left alone. Left alone to die. I was sure of that.

Elwin R. Sanborn

"Have a cigarette," I heard someone say. Rolling my eyes to one side, I saw a colored boy offering me a cigarette.

"Oh, lord, no!" I said wearily, and no doubt with despair in my voice. "I don't want to smoke. I don't want anything."

The negro, when he offered me the cigarette, was prone on his bed beside mine. But he leaned over toward me.

"You mustn't talk like that in here," he said. "You'll be all right," he continued, "if you fight. And you've got to fight to help the rest of us. A fellow's got to help out in here, to keep all of us from gettin' low in the mind. You'll learn."

Such was my initiation into a public accident ward in a great city. I lived through that early twilight, through that night and the next day. On the third day a private room was vacant, and they said I might have it; but I refused! They couldn't have taken me, except against my will, out of that ward. I had learned, as the negro said I would. I had caught the esprit de corps of the ward, had come up to the high morale of the patients confined in such a place. Ward patients help each other. I was "the new man," so particularly did they help me. Those who were able to walk, came over and talked with me. Others shouted from distant beds to know how "the new man" was (Continued on page 136)

War Drums

A stirring romance of the early American wilderness

By HERBERT RAVENEL SASS

Illustrated by Stockton Mulford

IT SEEMED to Lachlan that he had been fighting for an eternity—that for unnumbered hours he had been circling the moonlit meadow under Sani'gilagi's summit, parrying, thrusting, battling for his life, while in front of him Lance Falcon danced and shimmered behind a shifting, glimmering veil of steel—a crouching, hideously-smiling figure, yet darkly handsome, unreal, elusive as the moonlight itself, baleful as some nameless phantom of a dream.

To Lachlan all that had happened and was happening was unreal. It seemed to him that his mind and body dwelt apart; that his hand and eye were fighting this fight without direction from his brain; that the moves which he made were not made consciously, but were wholly mechanical, as though his body had become an automaton animated by some force within itself over which he had no control.

Yet he knew that never before had he fought so well. His eyes—and apparently Falcon's also—seemed as much at home in the brilliant moonlight as in the full light of day. He knew that he was fighting with all the art of which he was capable, that he was utilizing with almost perfect skill all that O'Sullivan had taught him; and he was not alarmed at the discovery, which he had made early in the combat, that Falcon was at least his peer in swordcraft, while enjoying also the advantage of height and reach.

He had no sense of apprehension or of nervousness. His mind was not here in the moonlit meadow where he was battling with Lance Falcon but in the little hut on the mountain top where Jolie Stanwicke was sleeping.

He saw her lying on her couch of boughs, smiling a little, her red-gold hair pushed back from her cool forehead. How beautiful her face was, and how lithe and strong her slim body, and how brave she had been amid all the perils of the wilderness! With a quick thrill of pleasure he recalled how she had learned to love the wilderness, despite its hardships and its terrors; and he wondered dully whether she had learned to love it well enough to go with him to his own land of Talasé and to dwell with him there.

But that, he told himself calmly, could not be. There was Gilbert Barradell, who had her heart and had crushed it, though as yet she did not know that Barradell was false. And there was Lance Falcon—this devil with whom he was fighting—Lance Falcon, who loved her as a fiend might love an angel and who would come back to Sani'gilagi with his Spaniards and Spanish Indians and carry her with him to St. Augustine.

The thought stung him to fury. Yet it was like the unreal fury of a dream, and almost at once it passed, leaving him cold. Eternity wore on. Falcon was attacking more vigorously, more boldly. Lachlan knew that they had circled the moonlit meadow many times, Falcon always advancing, himself always retreating. He knew, too, though he was scarcely conscious of the knowledge, that at last eternity was drawing to a close, that the battle neared its end. His mind still dwelt apart; but he was hazily and quite calmly aware of Falcon's more aggressive offense; and he knew mechanically—as though his senses knew it but not his brain—that Falcon planned to finish soon.

The slow, interminable minutes passed. He was retreating more rapidly now. He was moving backward around the meadow, and the rasping, hissing swords were as swift as lightning, as nimble as the flickering tongues of snakes.

Swift as was Lachlan's sword in defense, Falcon's was swifter in attack. Lachlan realized grimly the truth of what O'Sullivan had told him—that this man was an almost perfect master of the rapier, and that his enormous strength and his length of arm rendered him doubly formidable. Lachlan could not hold his ground for an instant. Falcon was rushing him, attacking him like a raging tiger, and Lachlan gave way before him—faster, faster, faster.

A SLOW cunning grew in Lachlan's brain. Now, with the final crisis upon him, his mental lethargy fell from him, his mind sprang awake to the fight, to his peril, to his opportunity.

There was one chance in a thousand; one faint, infinitesimal hope; one tenuous, almost incredible possibility.

He had been retreating so long and so swiftly that Falcon must think him beaten. If, now, he should suddenly attack—

Falcon's point touched Lachlan's shoulder, a moment later pricked his bare forearm. This, then, was the end: he had waited too long.

Lachlan laughed, braced himself for the shock, flung himself in the teeth of that whirlwind assault, lunged and lunged again.

A moment they stood like battling stallions, thrusting, stabbing, clashing steel against steel. Then Falcon staggered backward, stood swaying, fell face downward in the grass.

PRESENTLY Lachlan was aware of a voice behind him speaking his name—the voice of Jolie Stanwicke. He turned his head slowly.

She was standing, clad in her stained and faded buckskins, near where the trail came down into the open. Her eyes were wide and staring, and her face in the white moonlight was like that of a ghost. Behind her, where the trail entered the meadow, stood Mr. O'Sullivan.

She came forward slowly, and Lachlan walked toward her, while O'Sullivan ran quickly to the spot where Falcon lay motionless. She spoke no word, but she lifted her face as they met, and Lachlan took her in his arms. He looked down at her, and in her eyes he beheld a miracle.

He bent and kissed her lips. He told her then that he loved her, and she answered quietly:

"And I love you, Lachlan McDonald, though I did not know it till now!"

O'Sullivan had come forward as she spoke, and she held out her hand to him and he pressed it between his hands.

"I have known it for a long while, Jolie," he said softly, "ever since our first days on the mountain. I was only afraid that you would not discover it in time."

He paused and looked at her gravely.

"Captain Falcon is dead," he told her very gently. "Will you go back to the camp and tell Almayne what has happened here?"

When she had gone O'Sullivan turned to Lachlan.

"It was God's will, God's goodness," he said reverently. "She came out of her hut and ran to me where I sat on watch beside the ashes of the fire—Almayne had left me not five minutes before. She had dreamed, she said, that you were in peril here in the meadow, and I remembered that you had come this way and had taken my sword. We ran down the trail together, but she was swifter and left me a little behind."

The little man stood silent a moment.

"God's ways are strange," he continued. "From the trail above I saw what happened. She came out into the meadow a moment before you attacked. I think that Falcon saw her standing there in the moonlight and that for a fatal instant he was confused."

O'Sullivan paused once more.

"You owe your life to her, lad," he said, his hand on Lachlan's shoulder; "but perhaps it will be best if she never knows."

The two Muskogee warriors kept watch over Falcon's body that night lest some wandering wolf pack should find the place; and next morning, before Jolie had awakened, they laid him in a shallow trench dug with tomahawks, and piled stones upon the spot. Almayne leaned on his long rifle, frowning and scornful, while Mr. O'Sullivan spoke a few words of prayer over the grave; but Lachlan, remembering a day when he had stood by Falcon's side on the "Good Fortune's" deck in the midst of blood and death, seemed to hear once more a great voice booming above the gale.

O'Sullivan ended his prayer, and stood, a small, plump, white-headed figure in torn, black knee-breeches and mud-stained white shirt, gazing down at the mound of stones at his feet.

"He was an evil man," the little Irishman said slowly, "but, by Paul, he was a swordsman!"

With this brief epitaph they left Lance Falcon.

THAT day passed much as their other days on Sani'gilagi had passed. Yet for two of them it was such a day as had never been seen before. For Jolie Stanwicke and Lachlan McDonald the world that they had known had been blotted out and a new world had begun.

From the valley below, as they sat together near the edge of the cliff, the faint, insistent throbbing of the war drums floated upward on the evening air; but if they heard the sound, and remembered for a brief moment the peril which surrounded them, that peril mattered little.

Only once Jolie spoke of Gilbert Barradell; and it was then that Lachlan made known to her what Almayne had learned from Aganuntsi the Conjurer.

She listened calmly while Lachlan told her of Barradell's marriage to Concha's daughter. Then she kissed him and held his face between her hands and smiled into his eyes.

"I am glad that Gilbert is happy," she said, and sat for some minutes in silence, her head against Lachlan's shoulder.

Presently she laughed aloud. "Do you remember," she asked, "how I quizzed you about this Indian girl, this daughter of Chief Concha, and how I hoped that she was ugly? You did not guess what was in my mind?"

"I guessed it later," he answered.

"I think," she continued, smiling, "that even then I knew that Gilbert was as false as I have been—that even then I doubted him."

Her eyes softened suddenly.

"Listen!" she whispered. "A sanguilla; but it sings a different song."

"It is a mountain sanguilla," Lachlan told her, "a brighter, more beautiful bird, and one not often seen."

She listened to the bird, her eyes soft and thoughtful.

"Have you forgotten," she asked him, "the name you gave me—the Lady Sanguilla? Almayne told me. I have never heard you call me that, and I should like to hear it now!"

He whispered the name in her ear. She nodded and said no more. A few minutes later she was asleep, her head pillowed on his shoulder. He laid her gently on the moss, looked for a long while at her face with the long, silken lashes veiling the closed eyes, brushed the red-gold hair back from the smooth forehead. Then he joined Almayne and O'Sullivan.

It was at deep dusk of the second day after this that Aganuntsi the Conjurer came again.

They had finished the evening meal and were sitting around the little fire in front of Jolie's hut. The moon had not yet risen and only a few stars sparkled in the sky.

Suddenly, straight in front of her, Jolie saw two points of light. For an instant she believed that they were twin stars low against the southern horizon; but, as she watched them, they moved, and they were not white or yellow but pale yellow-green. She knew then that they were the eyes of a wild beast moving along the edge of the cliff, directly in front and not fifty yards away; and in the same instant she discerned dimly the outlines of a huge catlike shape behind the eyes.

She whispered a warning to the others. They needed no warning. Lachlan and O'Sullivan had already seen the beast; Almayne and the two Muskogee warriors, sitting at the other side of the fire, had turned their heads cautiously and were searching the gloom. Little Mink was reaching for the bow which lay on the rock near him, when Almayne spoke.

"It is the tame panther," he whispered. "Aganuntsi is coming!"

The words were scarcely spoken when the darkness took shape and the Conjurer stood before them.

Almayne rose and stood facing him. Neither uttered a sound. Aganuntsi turned and strode away into the night, and without a word Almayne followed him.

The twin stars which were the panther's eyes were motionless now. The beast had lain down near the edge of the precipice and there it waited, its yellow-green orbs glowing in the fitful light. Jolie could hear the low murmur of Aganuntsi's voice, could distinguish his form and that of Almayne standing motionless near the entrance of the trail leading down the mountain side.

In the circle about the fire no one spoke; none dared ask aloud what this second visit of the Conjurer could mean. Jolie shivered. With a strange fascination her eyes remained fixed upon the yellow-green orbs in front of her; and suddenly, as she watched them, they vanished.

Moving her head slightly, she saw Almayne returning. A steely light glittered in his deep-set eyes; his thin, tanned face was like that of a hunting hawk. His eyes rested on Jolie, and his lips tightened.

"AGANUNTSI came to warn us," he said slowly. "An Appalache scout wandered up the mountain this morning and saw us. They are coming to-night to take us. We must try for Fort Prince George."

There was a silence. Then Lachlan asked quietly:

"What think you, Almayne, of our chance of reaching the Fort?"

"A slim chance," the hunter growled. "One chance in five hundred. But they've been sending out scouting parties from the Fort. Aganuntsi didn't know in which directions— Heaven send one headed this way!"

Mr. O'Sullivan leaped to his feet and there was a smile upon his lips.

"We are going to win through for your sakes, Jolie and Lachlan!" he told them. "And I think there will be a minister in Fort Prince George."

Every moment was precious. Yet Jolie found time for one last look at the little camp on the mountain top before they stole down the path to the woods-encircled meadow below the summit, where the horses grazed. Within a few minutes they were mounted and away.

They followed no trail. They descended the upper slopes of Sani'gilagi by a steep and rocky way where even the sure-footed Chickasaw ponies were sometimes in danger of falling. The moon shone fitfully. Sometimes the forest around them was bathed in ghostly light, and twice Almayne halted them until drifting clouds obscured the moon once more.

There were many alarms. Again and again Jolie saw dim forms moving amid the trees, but always these proved to be small bands of deer. Once they were close to disaster, and were saved only because Little Mink, the taller of the two Muskogee warriors, was swifter of foot than a Cherokee sentinel who saw them and sped away through the moonlit woods.

Jolie saw the beginning of that race but not the end. She knew only that after a time Little Mink reappeared at Almayne's side, and nodded in reply to a short, guttural question of the hunter.

It was due to Aganuntsi the Conjurer that they were able to pierce the circle of enemies around Sani'-gilagi. Knowing the precise location of every Indian camp, he had advised Almayne as to the best route to take, and the hunter's consummate woodcraft and his intimate knowledge of the ground enabled him to follow these directions in every detail. Yet it was not only a miracle of skill which brought them safely through that first dangerous stage of their journey; it was also a miracle of good fortune.

When the dawn came they had left far behind them the valleys around Sani'-gilagi, where the camps of their enemies dotted the woods. There was less danger now, for a while, of a chance encounter with some wandering Indian band; but with every moment there was greater need of haste. Long ago their flight from the mountain top had been discovered. That they were being pursued was certain, and there was no telling how close behind them their pursuers were.

In the gray light of morning Almayne wheeled Nunda, his piebald pony, to the right and headed straight up the slope of a steep oak ridge. A few minutes later they found themselves in a narrow, deep-worn path or road winding along the ridge's wooded summit.

In short, quick-spoken sentences Almayne explained his change of plan, pointed out the necessity of greater speed. This was a buffalo path, he told them, one of the highways trodden out by the herds in passing back and forth across the mountain barrier. For some miles it would lead them in the general direction of Fort Prince George, and they would follow it for a while, because they could ride faster than in the unbroken forest. Without further word he set out at a brisk trot, the two Muskogees running just behind him.

To Jolie the swifter pace brought a sense of exhilaration. Her mind was oddly content. Throughout this journey she had been aware of a strange indifference to danger. Always, as she rode, she saw in her mind's eye the image of Lachlan. His place in the column was behind her; she could not see him without turning her head, and she turned it seldom. But with the eye of her (Continued on page 163)

Her horse was abreast of Almayne's, and she realized that he was shouting to her. . . . She could barely distinguish the words above the thunder of hoofs

Paul Meylan Has Drawn the Picture Of Scattergood Nearly a Hundred Times

PAUL MEYLAN has established at least two records among present-day American illustrators: he has drawn one character in approximately one hundred different poses and situations, and he has won the national amateur fencing championship. Perhaps he has a third record too, for he does not use professional models in making his pictures. His neighbors and friends in and around Bethel, Connecticut, pose for him. He lives eight miles from Bethel, on a somewhat remote farm, where he owns a beautiful old house with a great maple tree in front of it.

Readers of THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE know him as the man who illustrates Clarence Budington Kelland's stories about Scattergood Baines. He has been illustrating these stories for many years. Each story is complete in itself, and does not depend upon those that have gone before. And Scattergood, Kelland, and Meylan are still going strong! Stronger than ever. In the illustrations for a story the picture of Scattergood often appears more than once, which accounts for the fact that Mr. Meylan has made more Scattergood drawings than there have been Scattergood stories.

Mr. Meylan grew up on the lower West Side of New York City. His father was an expert watch maker, and intended that young Paul should follow in his craft. For generations, the Meylans have been famous as watch makers. This family trait of painstaking exactness in work influences Paul Meylan's art strongly. He is noted for his attention to detail.

Paul Meylan, illustrator of the "Scattergood Baines" stories in "The American Magazine," lives on a farm eight miles from Bethel, Connecticut, and uses his country neighbors for his models. Mr. Meylan is a former national amateur fencing champion. (In oval) Mr. Meylan's home

"I always did have a leaning toward art," Mr. Meylan says. "When I was just a child, I used to amuse the other members of my gang in West Seventeenth Street by drawing pictures on the sidewalk. I managed to study art while attending the public schools of New York. At the age of eighteen, I was given a job on the New York 'Evening World' as an illustrator. Then I went to the Boston 'Herald,' where I worked for three years, and took a few courses at Harvard in my spare time. In 1903, I returned to New York to become a free-lance illustrator. Since then, that has been my profession. But fate has played a funny trick on me. My pet hope has been to get a story in which there is a fencing duel. But never yet have I had a story of that kind, although I have been a fencer for years, and once held the national amateur championship.

"Fencing and baseball! How many of my hours have those two sports consumed! For years I fenced some every day, and when I lived in New York City, as I did until five years ago, I could never work in the afternoons if there was a baseball game in town that I could get to."

When Mr. Meylan first began to illustrate the Kelland stories, he used a New York policeman as his model for Scattergood. The imaginary hardware merchant of Coldriver then had black hair. But Kelland has been writing the stories so long, Meylan illustrating them, and the public demanding them, that now you see old Scattergood with snow-white locks. And the New York cop is no longer the model. A resident of Connecticut is the man who now poses for this famous short-story character.

"When I first moved to Bethel," Mr. Meylan said, "I had some trouble with my work, because I needed models. It was hard to get my neighbors to pose for me. But they now do it almost eagerly. I see someone who looks like a certain character whose picture I am to make, and I ask him, or her, to pose, paying, of course, the usual model's fees, as I think that is only the right thing to do. Sometimes people ask to be allowed to pose!

"My friends ask me to tell them when a Scattergood story is coming out, and when one does appear, every copy of THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE is sold from all the nearby stands, for the people want to see whom I have used as models, and also to read the story, of course! Scattergood is very real to us around Bethel. Everyone knows who poses for his picture. But there is great curiosity as to whose pictures will appear for the occasional characters.

"'I see you used that dairyman's boy in your last story,' some man will say to me. 'When you going to get a story that has someone in it who looks like me?' That's how friendly Scattergood has made us up around my home.

"Whenever I get a new Scattergood story from the magazine, I have to wait until after supper, and then read it aloud to my wife and daughter. They won't let me read it first, though I should like to. I receive many letters from Scattergood's admirers."

There is one feature of the Scattergood illustrations that you have never guessed. In nearly every story, Mr. Meylan draws a picture of himself. If there is a crowd, his likeness is in it. If there is some man in a ludicrous situation, Mr. Meylan takes that rôle.

"I put myself in the illustrations," he explained, "because I did not have a model who could register the decided facial expressions I sometimes need, and because I do not want to picture any of my neighbors in ridiculous poses. It would make their friends laugh at them.

"I study the character I am to take, get into his feelings, then stand in front of a camera, screw my face up to denote a stomach-ache, break into a great guffaw, or do whatever the scene may require, and Mrs. Meylan snaps the camera. I then draw myself from the photograph.

"But all of this is far from what I set out to do years ago. When I was younger, I collected a great library on Napoleon, and studied hard all sorts of military matters, hoping to illustrate military stories. When I became a fencer, I hoped that I might occasionally be called on to draw a man with a sword in his hand. As I have told you, this hasn't happened yet. Still, I'm not kicking. Scattergood suits me; Scattergood and the other stories I get from magazines." JAMES C. DERIEUX

She Isn't Afraid of High Places or People

LIKE the Northwestern Mounted Police, Virginia Edwards "gets her man." But more frequently it is a woman, for women, especially pretty ones, are always in demand for newspaper pictorial sections. Sometimes it is a child, since child pictures can be depended upon to attract even the casual reader's attention. Not infrequently it is a "shot" of an accident, in which a street car has crashed through a house or an engine gone over a bridge, or a panorama of a crowd, or a hasty snapshot of a famous visitor to the city as he is driven around Monument Circle.

For any or all of these things may come in the course of a regular day's duties of a newspaper photographer in Indianapolis, and because Virginia Edwards is a woman—one of the very few women photographers in newspaper work in any part of the country—doesn't excuse her from any sort of assignment. "In fact," she says, "I've been able to get several pictures that wouldn't have been available to a man. That isn't on account of my ability, you understand, but because men are still a little soft-hearted when they deal with women, and will make concessions they wouldn't make to a man. And, while I try not to take advantage of this, I certainly never object to any courtesy that's shown me, for it helps me to get the picture, and that, after all, is the important thing."

"Do you ever fail to get a picture because it must be taken from some point that is impossible for a woman to reach?" Miss Edwards was asked.

"I've never seen such a place," she replied. "One of the first pictures I had to take for the Indianapolis 'Times' was a shot at the crowd at the dedication service of the Indiana War Memorial. There were two men photographers there, and they had discovered that the only place to get a good picture of the crowd was from a narrow ledge on the monument, a pretty scary distance above the speakers' stand.

"Not only was the distance something to think about, but the climb had to be made in full view of an audience of several thousand persons—and all of them, I knew, would enjoy the novelty of a woman scaling a scaffold that was even a stiff climb for a man. However, there was nothing to do but climb it, so I hung on to my camera with one hand and the scaffold with the other, forgot the crowd, and pulled myself up alongside of my masculine competitors, both of whom were good enough to give me a lift on the last and worst stretch.

Virginia Edwards, photographer for the Indianapolis "Times," doesn't mind climbing monuments or scaffolds to get pictures. The hard part of her job is persuading her subjects to be photographed

"I had a chance to return the favor later on, however—not in helping them to a high point of vantage but in supplying the flashlight for a picture that couldn't be taken in the late afternoon light. It was of a street car that had crashed into the front room of a house; and we had to rush out and get the picture before the car was moved.

As usual, I took with me everything I might possibly need—I guess that's the feminine quality showing up in me—and when I got there I found the photographer from the morning paper bewailing his luck because he'd arrived without any flashlight powder, and the light was too poor for a picture without it. Naturally, I supplied the flash; I had to, to get my own picture, and he shot his at the same time—and used it first, since his paper came out in the morning and mine couldn't be used before noon."

Another high climb that Miss Edwards made was out of a skylight and across the roof of the Union Station, to photograph a flag-pole painter.

"And if I could have made a better picture by climbing the flagpole, I'd certainly have tried it," she added.

"It isn't the high climbs or the hurried 'runs' that try a newspaper photographer's ability, however. It is the difficulty of dealing with every sort of person, from criminal to society woman, from politician to publicity representative.

"If I tried to name any one class of people who are the hardest in Indiana to photograph, I'd say it was the Indiana politician going to sign his bond. Some time ago, indictments against public office holders were not uncommon, and every time an indictment was returned I had to rush over to the courthouse, hide around a corner, and 'shoot' the indicted one as he came out. During the recent political scramble in which Mayor Duvall was ousted and his wife and two other contenders put into the office temporarily I almost camped at City Hall, photographing mayors; and while the incoming ones were willing to look pleasant, the outgoing ones didn't want to be photographed at all.

"Since I've been in newspaper work I've perfected a method by which that 'hard' look so characteristic of newspaper pictures is done away with. There isn't time for retouching, so, to remove the harsh line, I do my enlarging through a screen of four thicknesses of metal cloth.

"I've found that women are more willing to be photographed if I give them time to fix their hair, and men seem always to appreciate it if you suggest that they straighten their ties. It pays to make friends with your subjects, for the better humor they are in, the better the picture will be—and the better your chances are to get another picture if you need it.

"Nearly all women object at first to being photographed, and have to be coaxed, and it is very rare indeed for a woman—or a man—to refuse after he's been reasoned with for ten or fifteen minutes."

Miss Edwards's only technical preparation for her work was several years' experience in a small studio, where she did photographing, developing, printing, and enlarging. She does all of this now, between hurried trips to pick up some "rush" picture. But the technical ability is only a part of the qualifications of a newspaper photographer, she believes.

"I think that any newspaper photographer must remember certain requirements of a 'news picture,'" she explained. "First, it's necessary to get people into the picture. Second, a good newspaper picture ought to have action in it. Third, it must be right as a composition. And, along with all of these, you've got to watch your light, your background, your time. But, most of all, you've got to like your work, to find it so interesting that nothing you run up against matters, so long as you make good."

You Can Shoe a Horse or a Car at the Whitneys' Place

THIS is the story of an auto mechanic. His name is Raymond Whitney, and his shop and house are near the little hamlet of New Marlboro, Massachusetts. And any day, if you are motoring up near Great Barrington and happen to follow a line of cars off the main road, you are likely to find that you are following a beaten path to his door. For on Sunday, as well as every other day in the week, twenty or thirty cars are parked in the yard waiting for Mr. Whitney to diagnose their troubles.

Wealthy people from New York bring their summer cars up to Mr. Whitney to be put in repair during the winter. Vacationists in the Berkshires with auto licenses ranging from Florida to Canada wait anxiously for Mr. Whitney to emerge from under their cars and give the result of his examination.

Strangely enough, Raymond Whitney is not called by his first name, as most mechanics are—although he is very popular with his customers. When you see him you like him. A mop of curly blond hair tops a keen face that might be that of a broker if it were not for his athletic body, which is too husky for a mere Sunday golfer. If you don't find him in at the shop, wait a few minutes, and you will probably hear the noise of a motor racing down the road. It will be driven by one of Mr. Whitney's men, while Whitney hangs on the side of the car with his ear to the motor, like a doctor listening to the beat of his patient's heart.

The Whitney shop, in spite of the fact that it is off in the hills, is one of the most complete anywhere in the country. It has its own machine shop, welding and forging departments, and a corps of five enthusiastic mechanics—"Whitney-trained."

Much of his knowledge Mr. Whitney attributes to his father, the village blacksmith. He points to a pile of horseshoes stacked higher than a man's head—a strange sight in these horseless days.

"You see, they still find Dad," he says, "even though the main road was steered off in the other direction, and left us up here in the woods 'way off their route."

Like a connecting link between the old era and the new, the modern auto repair shop is joined right onto the old blacksmith shop, which was built some fifty years ago. And Albert Whitney, Raymond's father, still uses the anvil which keeps the farm horses of that vicinity in shoes, just as his son keeps the horseless carriages in shoes. Although the son is an expert mechanic, and doesn't go in for vulcanizing, he is always ready to remedy auto ills, whether it is a flat tire or a burned bearing.

Raymond Whitney, automobile expert of New Marlboro, Massachusetts. His father has a blacksmith shop beside the garage, and his sons want to be airplane mechanics

Some time ago, a school-teacher summering in a small car of a very old make, stopped by the Whitney shop in the midst of a busy day.

"I've lost a lug off my spare tire, and I have to carry it in the back of the car. It's almost ruining a bandbox with my new hat in it. Can you get me another lug?" she asked.

"I'll fix you up," Mr. Whitney promised. "I'll run over to Barrington and get you one. Drop in to-morrow."

But neither Barrington nor any other town near by yielded the exact sort of lug needed. On schedule time, however, in the midst of another busy day, the school-teacher appeared for the lug.

Mr. Whitney scratched his head, and looked at the spare tire which threatened the bandbox with the new hat in it.

"I'll have to make you one," he said. And going into the blacksmith shop he got busy at the forge, and a little later came out with the finished lug.

Mr. Whitney received his early training at the old forge. "But Raymond's interest was always in mechanics," his father said. "He used to help me here in the shop when he was only a youngster. In those days, up there 'round the bend of this road was where the old grist mill used to stand. There were two stores up there too, and we were right on the main road, where folks had to pass. Sometimes we'd shoe as many as sixty-five horses in two days.

"At night, Raymond used to study books on mechanics. There were plenty of broken-down flivvers up in these rocky hills and he got lots of practice."

Perhaps you wonder why the Whitney shop is hidden away up in the hills, where the approach is rocky and winding. There are two good reasons: Mr. Whitney's two boys, aged seven and nine. They, by the way, aspire to be airplane mechanics, so perhaps some day the old blacksmith shop and the auto repair shop will boast a new addition, for fliers in trouble—thus completing three generations of progress.

The most delicious vegetable soup you ever tasted!

BABY lima beans of the most enticing flavor. Dainty little peas, sweet and nourishing. Sweet corn which is the aristocrat of the fields. Ruddy, luscious tomatoes, sun-ripened on the vines. Chantenay carrots, white potatoes and sweet potatoes, specially selected to meet the Campbell's standard of quality.

Snow-white celery. Choice turnips and cabbage. Okra, sweet red peppers, parsley fresh every day from our own farms, a touch of onion and leek to heighten the flavor.

Fine pearl barley and alphabet macaroni. Strength-giving broth of beef. All of these—and more—are in every plateful of Campbell's Vegetable Soup! Because it takes no less than thirty-two different ingredients to make the best vegetable soup!

This soup, with its ideal combination of vegetables, cereals, beef broth and condiments is the wholesome kind of food from which good health and bodily vigor are built.

Usually in the home kitchen, the water in which vegetables are boiled is thrown away. Yet that water has absorbed mineral salts valuable in building bone and muscle and tissue. In the making of soup, these salts are retained in abundant strength and, of course, they are especially rich in Campbell's Vegetable Soup, with its fifteen different vegetables.

For luncheon or supper, Campbell's Vegetable Soup is an ideal dish—so filling—so welcome to the appetite. At dinner it provides a generous portion of the needed nourishment, again making your task that much simpler.

And the children! What a problem they often present to the mother so anxious that their food shall give the most benefit. Let them eat often, and freely, this most healthful of foods.

Campbell's kitchens offer to your table no less than twenty-one different soups—each the masterpiece of its kind. Read the full list on the Campbell's label. Then make your selections and go to your grocer. He has, or will gladly get for you, any Campbell's Soups you select. 12 cents a can.

And think of the convenience! All you have to do is add an equal quantity of water, bring to a boil and allow to simmer for a few minutes. Then the soup—hot, savory, delicious—is all ready for your table.

THE RISE OF PREVENTIVE MEDICINE

Only a few months ago the Mississippi River overflowed its banks. And, seeking refuge from its swollen, yellow waters, millions of men, women and children were thrown together, homeless, helpless, often starving—subsisting for a period under the most primitive conditions.

Fifty years ago, disease would have flared up inevitably. Contagious diseases, spreading through the camps of refugees, would soon have threatened the entire country. Then the Mississippi disaster, dreadful as it already was, would have assumed terrifying proportions under the grim shadow of pestilence.

But instead, from every part of the country, by automobile and train and airplane, vaccines and antitoxins in tiny, precious vials came to the flooded regions. Organized bands worked day and night, inoculating, vaccinating, applying all the available knowledge of preventive medicine to avert the peril of contagion. And their labor was successful. At no time was disease ever a threat outside of the stricken area.

The rise of preventive medicine has been swift indeed. Two generations have not gone by since Pasteur proved to the world that it was within the power of man to conquer contagious disease. And already typhoid, yellow fever, cholera, diphtheria, smallpox, scarlet fever—many of our worst enemies—have been mastered.

More important still, we are no longer satisfied merely to fight diseases. We are learning actually to make ourselves immune to their attacks.

In this work of prevention, E. R. Squibb & Sons have always been recognized as important factors. The work of the Squibb Laboratories in furnishing dependable serums and antitoxins during such emergencies as the Mississippi disaster was in line with a tradition built by almost seventy-five years of active co-operation with the medical profession in its struggle against disease.

During these years physicians have come to rely more and more upon the purity and reliability of Squibb Products. They have learned by experience that everything under the Squibb label is of unquestionable trustworthiness. For only the purest materials go into Squibb Products. Science, skill and care are used in their manufacture.

Thus Squibb vaccines and antitoxins have given the medical profession powerful and dependable means for prevention of infectious diseases.

Similarly, the familiar Squibb Household Products such as Bicarbonate of Soda, Epsom Salt, Milk of Magnesia, Castor Oil, Cod-Liver Oil, etc., have given thousands of homes reliable means with which to meet the minor emergencies that often arise in every-day life.

The "Priceless Ingredient" of every product is the honor and integrity of its maker.

THE HICKS ARE NOT ALL IN THE COUNTRY

By H. I. Phillips

Wherein the Author succumbs to a rural urge

THERE is a saying, "You can take a hick out of the country but you can't take the country out of a hick."

The author of that tune is no bush-league philosopher.

I've lived in a big city a long time now and I like to think I'm what is known as a big-city man. But I'm really a hick all over. And I know it. Still, I've got company. There are probably more hicks per square foot in one block in any metropolitan city than there are per square mile in the small towns. And they're not all visitors.

A hick is a man who left the country for the city but who can never quite forget it and be on the level with himself.

He is a man who pretends to himself that he likes bright lights, jazz orchestras, wise-cracking actors, the roar of subway trains, automatic lunch-rooms, first-night openings, the $3.50 table d'hôte dinner, and the right to pay $8 to see a terrible show. But he is also the guy who, in his sincere moments, knows he has a secret itch for the country store, the pinochle game at Hose Company No. 2, the cows in the clover, bird dogs, the old swimming hole, a shot at partridges, a chat with Joe Snarks, the combination game warden, sheriff, chief of police and dog catcher, a good home-cooked dinner at Aunt Minnie's, and an hour in the cool of a spring evening listening to Sparks's Military Band on the village green.

I'm a hick.

And I've about decided I'll never live it down. Furthermore, I'm going to stop trying. Apparently, there's no use trying. I dress like a city feller, keep abreast of every change in collar styles, speak sternly to taxicab drivers, submit to being robbed by the producers of the smartest musical shows, pay restaurant checks without adding them up, call at least six head waiters at leading hotels by their first names, live in an apartment that costs about three times what I can afford, sit nonchalantly in a subway train while a woman with two children stands up in front of me, accept credulously from a barber a tip on General Motors, and even attend all the return bouts between Dempsey and Tunney, without complaining. Yet any person told to look at me and behold the Typical Big Town Boy would ask, "What's wrong with this picture?"

Somebody is always squinting at me curiously, and then saying, "Aren't you from Medicine Hat?" "Didn't I see you in Chillicothe last Fair Day?" or, "I know you. You're Ed Rivers, who used to play in the Stony Creek Fife and Drum Corps. How's everything back home?"

In my ten years in New York, I have never yet been mistaken for a born-and-bred New Yorker. Nobody has ever made the mistake of striding across a night club, slapping me on the back and saying, "Hello, Cohan, what's new in the Roaring Forties?" Evidently I don't look the part.

I'd like to be, and I've tried to be, but, no matter how you scramble a country egg, it will still be a country egg.

THE cow in Central Park, New York, has been there for years, not a stone's throw from Broadway, and while she looks somewhat more sophisticated than the common herd of bovine creatures, you would know at a glance that she is still a cow.

I know dozens of city dwellers whose every attitude, gesture, expression, and action indicates that they were born in the subway, raised in the lobby of a skyscraper hotel, and educated in a revolving door, yet the low-down on these lads is that they helped pitch hay, water the stock and milk the cows until they were very big boys. Why, most of 'em never saw a moving stairway, a Broadway song writer, a marble lobby, a moving-picture actress, an original musical comedy cast, a highway robbery in front of a police station, a genuine traffic snarl, or an ambulance scoring four victims while going for one, until they were old enough to vote.

Now and then you meet a chap who can be both the hick and the "city slicker" without feeling that he's double-crossing himself. But it takes a good man to do it. One of New York's best-known men about town, a man who is a familiar figure in the night life of the city, and who knows his New York as few other men do, makes his home on a farm by day and is proud of it. He loves the White Lights and he loves green hills. And he manages to feel at home with both. It's a good trick—if you can turn it.

Now, cabarets, night clubs, first-night performances, smart hotels, zippy dinners and gala balls don't dazzle me. Frankly, I am bored by the Big Parade. The Gay White Way strikes me as neither white nor gay. Much of what should, I suppose, impress and awe me seems the bunk.

After I had been on a New York newspaper three years, and developed what I thought was a real big-city air, I gave myself away at once. I took a sight-seeing boat to see the Statue of Liberty, and even climbed up into the lady's shoulder. The office heard about it, and it took me months to get back as a member of the staff in good standing. Sight-seeing is still my weakness, and you will often find me looking down on New York from the Woolworth Tower, going by bus to Chinatown, riding through the park in a hansom cab, staggering through the Metropolitan Museum of Art, watching the seal at the Aquarium, visiting Grant's Tomb, and sailing around Manhattan Island on a wheezing ferry boat with the rest of the yokels.

A couple of weeks ago I went to Battery Park and paid a fakir ten cents for the privilege of looking through one of those telescopes with window glass in both ends. It wasn't the first time, either. Within the past year, I have bought a "Guide to New York" from one of those Park Row venders. I don't know why. I bought it on a day when I wasn't feeling like sight-seeing. It must have been the old hick instinct.

If a man enjoys being a rube, why bother about curing him?

I MADE my first visit to Chicago not long ago. It is one of the greatest cities in the world. It has public buildings, parks, drives, theatres, night clubs, and other institutions well worth visiting; but where do you suppose I spent my one afternoon there? You're right. Visiting the stock yards! The only thing that consoles me is that my companion in yokelry was a man who prides himself on being a man of the world, a big-city notable, a true cosmopolite. In fact, he suggested the expedition. Yes, he's from a small town too.

I got a real kick out of the stock-yard visit. I even liked the smell of the stock yards, which is the ultimate test of chronic and incurable hickeritis.

To me, the most attractive things in New York are the Bronx Botanical Gardens, the Zoo, the view of the Hudson from Inspiration Point, the Poe Cottage, Paddy's Market, the bar John Masefield once tended, the Coney Island boats, the Brooklyn Bridge, the Stock Exchange, the ruins of Fort Washington, Fifth Avenue at the height of the Christmas rush, Madison Square Garden, Roxy's and the Paramount Theatres, the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, Trinity Churchyard, Louis Mann's collars, the exhibit of old railroad trains at the Grand Central Station, Grand Central Palace, the Flea Circus in the heart of the Gay White Way, Cleopatra's Needle in Central Park, the site of the first Edison Electric Light Plant, the Hippodrome, the Woolworth Building, the Jersey ferries and the river and harbor traffic as seen from a bench to leeward of the Aquarium.

The Central Park cow meets a man who understands her

I WOULD rather spend ten minutes in the Bronx Botanical Gardens than three hours in the swellest night club in town. The sheep in Central Park interest me more than the vaudeville and musical comedy stars to be seen any time in Longacre Square.

I think the best three entertainments in New York each year are Tex Austin's Rodeo, Ringling Brothers, and the Poultry Show. Fourth place goes to the Dog Show, with special reference to the setters, pointers, and collies. The fifth best entertainment, as far as I am concerned, is the annual auction of excess zoo stock by the municipal park department. I have attended this auction for years. My first year in New York, a city editor sent me up to cover it, and one of the jolts I received was in identifying one of the most interested spectators as Flo Ziegfeld, supposedly the most blasé of blasé cosmopolites.

He was not only a spectator but a buyer. He bought a couple of elks and some sheep.

I made a bid or two that year and have been among the bidders nearly every year since. I bid on bison, gnus, polar bears, tigers, camels, Shetland ponies, sheep, prairie dogs, hedgehogs, wolves, bears, and leopards. I haven't the slightest use for any of these animals, nor is my apartment adapted to their care. I have never visualized a spotted deer over by the phonograph, a bison behind the floor lamp or a camel beside the radio set. I bid for these animals because it exercises an impulse that must be a kind of throw-back to aboriginal ancestors.

One of these days an auctioneer is going to say, "Sold to that gentleman over there with the scared look!" before somebody tops my bid. This distressing circumstance will occur, in all probability, while I am bidding on an African lion or a Bengal tiger!

I have never been able to see any sense in that time-honored classic of life in a big city, the Six-Day Bicycle Race; but I will fight anybody for a chance to see a good old-fashioned trotting meet.

I'm on Broadway a lot, but if you were making a search for me you probably would find me in one of those fake jewelry auctions, bidding $4.80 for "a genuine 18-stone diamond ring," watching a demonstrator demonstrate a corn plaster in a drug-store window, listening to a street-corner go-getter shout about the unparalleled opportunities to be derived from a small investment in some far-off property, having my photograph taken in one of those stores where a new machine takes you from eight angles at once, or gazing into a rôtisserie window watching the chef tend the roasting chickens. I even stop in front of Childs restaurant windows and watch the girl "flip" wheat cakes. Greater proof of a hick than that hath no man.

There's something about a side-show that gets me every time. Sword swallowers, snake charmers, fat women, blue men, Siamese twins, Wild Men of Borneo, fire eaters, midgets, giants, and bearded women will distract me from any errand, mission, or work.

I never failed to get up before sunrise to see the circus arrive and pitch tents until I was close to thirty years of age. I recall no moment of greater joy in the big city than that experience, about two years ago, when, by arrangement with the press department of Ringling Brothers circus, I dressed as an Indian maharajah and marched in the Brooklyn parade directly in front of the elephants. I felt a great urge to stay with the show, and might have done so if the regular occupant of the costume hadn't demanded it back.

I WOULD, beyond much doubt, meet all the specifications for what used to be known back in the McKinley Administration as a "rubberneck." It is no effort for me to stop and look, and not much to listen. A safe being hoisted up the side of a tall building, a sign painter putting a number in gold leaf on a store window, a window dresser arranging the dummies to carry out the idea of a perfect day at the Fox and Hounds Club, a policeman putting chalk marks on the wheels of an automobile that has exceeded the parking time limit, a litter of puppies in the window of a dog store, a private car owner and a taxicab driver in an argument over the right of way, a truckman gathering up a crate of cabbages that fell from his truck in a congested street, a musician trying to get through a turnstile with a bass drum, a motorcycle cop following a dashing lady in a low red roadster, an armored truck being unloaded outside a bank, a street urchin angling for a dime below a grating with a piece of gum on the end of a stick, a fakir demonstrating a cement for mending broken crockery, a patrol wagon going through the street with a load of hoboes, a crowd milling in front of a movie theatre, a horse fallen down on a slippery street, will command

How We Win Men

To Our New Shaving Cream

A 10-day test at our expense that proves to 85% of those who try it that the claims we make are based on fact

GENTLEMEN:

No man is ever convinced against his will. And extravagant claims fail to impress when the product itself cannot live up to them.

So in introducing our new shaving cream to you we discard bombast and boasting, and rest our case flatly on your decision after you have made a suitable trial of the product itself.

Now we offer you a ten-day test, at our expense. We expect it to prove to you in your own bathroom that this is the finest shaving cream you have ever used. Our whole case rests on merit alone convincing you.

We take the risk—not you

If we are right, surely you want to know about it. And, since the big majority of those who make this test become wedded to Palmolive Shaving Cream, we feel we have a good chance to win you.

Palmolive Shaving Cream is no accident. We started by asking 1000 men what they most desired in a shaving preparation. Then set out to give it to them.

Formula after formula failed in the complete result—129 in all. Then success came. Our great laboratories, skilled for 60 years in soap supremacy, had created another leader.

These 5 things you wish

1. Multiplies itself in lather 250 times.
2. Softens the beard in one minute.
3. Maintains its creamy fullness for 10 minutes on the face.
4. Strong bubbles hold the hairs erect for cutting.
5. Fine after-effects due to palm and olive oil content.

Now mail the coupon

We take the risk—not you. We undertake to please you . . . to win you in ten shaves. Won't you mail the coupon, please?

my undivided attention at any time and any place.

I once lost my wife in a Fifth Avenue crowd when I became too absorbed watching a Maltese cat try to cross the street at the height of a traffic rush. Even on a hurry call to a doctor's office I will stop to observe every detail of that fascinating sight—the driver of an interurban bus full of passengers trying to jack up the car and change a flat tire. Only last week I missed a ferry to Jersey because I stopped to watch a billboard artist paint in the eyes, nose, and teeth of a character in a famous chewing gum advertisement. When he had finished the eyes I was tempted to leave, but he began work on the nose at once and held me. I then tried to leave, but was intrigued by the desire to see him do the lips and teeth. All my life I have wanted to catch at work the man who precedes the painter and lays out the design in crayon or pencil. I have never been on the job at the right time, but some day I will catch him, and suspend work for the day.

A man with a surveying instrument anywhere will slow me up considerably, and a chance to watch one riveter toss red-hot rivets to another in the steel structure of a new building will keep me from my best friend's wedding. More than once I have sacrificed an important hour waiting for a couple of Italians to touch up a blast that would crack up another ton of rock in excavating for a new skyscraper.

I can never pass an excavation without looking in to see what is going on, although I know very well it won't be anything I can comprehend. Firemen testing the pumping efficiency of a new fire engine by determining how high it shoots a stream of water can always count on my deep interest. A man chasing his hat in a breeze seems to fascinate me, and I am one of those goops who always stop to look at a police dog or great Dane in the front seat of an imperial limousine.

THIS is nothing to be proud of. It costs me plenty of time and money. I'd be much farther ahead financially if I could be taken to work in a curtained hack and brought home again in a covered wagon.

Now and then I try to conquer my curiosity. I made a valiant effort to do so the day Lindbergh arrived back in the United States. Here was one of the greatest demonstrations and receptions of all time. I didn't want to miss it, but had just returned from a strenuous week-end on the morning of his arrival in New York, and had decided to stay at home and hear it on the radio. This sacrifice was in a measure due to the fact that I knew it would mean quite a struggle to get anywhere near our hero. I tuned in on the radio and heard the broadcaster describe the scenes in down-town New York, the great crowds, the decorations, the picturesque doings on the water front as the arrival of the boat bearing Lindy was awaited.

"I never saw a more wonderful sight," he said. "I've seen a great many demonstrations but never anything like this . . . and Lindy isn't even in sight yet!"

Then he described the passing of some troops and societies through Broadway, and I could clearly hear the bands and the drum corps. "It's a wonderful sight, folks," continued the announcer, having no idea how he was ruining my plans. "The crowds are swelling every minute. . . . There! . . . They've broken through the police lines . . . it's a great sight, folks. . . ."

I was getting weaker and weaker.

Presently I could hear the tooting of harbor craft and the booming of guns.

"Lindy's ship is coming up the bay," said the announcer. "The harbor has gone mad. Oh, folks, you don't know what you're missing if you're not down here to-day. This is a never-to-be-forgotten spectacle. Folks, the ship is now—"

IT WAS too much.

I grabbed my hat and started for the door.

"Where are you going?" asked Mrs. Phillips.

"Down-town to see Lindy arrive," I said.

"But I thought—" began Mrs. Phillips.

"So did I," I replied, hustling downstairs and grabbing a taxi. I made the City Hall just as Lindy was starting the parade from the Battery, stampeded the newspaper office by a last-minute demand for a reception ticket, and, despite the interference of several picket lines of husky policemen, managed to get to the City Hall steps and be in on the big doings. As Lindy turned from Broadway into City Hall Park, I was on the edge of the speakers' platform, my head bloody but unbowed.

Wanting to "see all the sights" is not my only hick weakness. I have other truly rural characteristics. For one thing, I am still backward about letting the porter at the railroad station grab my suit case. I still have that unsophisticated feeling that he may not be a porter at all, but just a crook in disguise. Head-waiters still awe me, and I feel positively awkward in the presence of hotel and apartment house doormen whose uniforms indicate they outrank General Pershing, and Admiral Sims.

The first thing I do after getting a room in a hotel (fireproof or not) is to look for the fire escape and plan what I should do in case of a fire. Then I look in the closet to see if any bandit is therein concealed. I suffer from that backwoods belief that all box-office attendants make it a point to sell patrons seats behind pillars, and that they, in common with all hotel cashiers and taxicab drivers, will short-change anybody who isn't vigilant.

I feel ill at ease in dinner clothes, and think a stiff shirt should be worn by ambassadors, Cabinet officers, Vice Presidents, waiters, minstrels, and men being punished for serious crimes. I would feel conspicuous wearing spats, and always have a guilty look when carrying a cane.

I buy souvenir programs at boxing bouts, must have peanuts to enjoy a ball game, and can't leave a circus without some red lemonade.

A month ago I did that which no man with the hay out of his ears ever does: I rode on the back of an observation car throughout the daylight hours of a one-thousand-mile trip! All that consoles me as I make the confession is the fact that my companion was a born-and-bred New Yorker, a Man of the World, and a city dweller who would be hurt if anybody intimated that there was anything of the hick about him. The observation car platform ride was his idea, believe it or not.

We were going to Chicago on the same train. "The train leaves at three-forty," he said. "Now, let's get there early and grab chairs on the platform of the observation car. Otherwise, somebody'll get 'em. We can ride all the way to Syracuse on the back platform."

It sounded all right to me.

"How early should we get to the station?" I asked.

"Three o'clock," he said. "The minute the gates open we can rush in and grab those chairs."

If I had realized at the time that it was a hick stunt, I would have suspected some practical joking. However, he was there ahead of me at three o'clock and led the rush to the rear platform. Even after we passed out of the electrification zone and the steam engine took hold of the train we remained on the platform. From time to time some other passenger would come out for a few minutes; but we were the only two in the whole train who were apparently there on an election bet. We got enough coal in our eyes, nostrils, and throats to keep several families warm all winter. Our faces were coated with dust and dirt; we were in need of a Turkish bath; but we stuck it out.

I was for quitting several times, but my companion insisted it was the only way to ride and enjoy the scenery. As he was a man who had the reputation of knowing his onions, I assumed he knew his anthracite.

Not until I reached Chicago and told a friend about the rear platform did I sense the shame of it all.

"You can see all the scenery from inside the observation car," he said with disgust. "What's the idea riding on the platform? Taking soot samples for the Public Health Service or something?"

My new friend, the big-towner, the Man of the World, rode back to New York that way. But I stayed inside the car. Even now I'm not sure which is the real hick.

Anyhow, I've given up trying to cure myself.

A FEW days ago I had an appointment to go to the station and meet an old friend from the great open spaces on his first visit to the big city. He thinks I'm a regular city feller, a wise, blasé big-towner.

I was late and missed him.

Later, I located him at a hotel and explained that I was unavoidably detained. I didn't say what detained me.

Several things did it: First, as I left the office, there was a skywriter writing a cigarette advertisement in the skies, and, of course, I had to stand and watch him until he completed the last upstroke on the final letter "S."

And then, just when I had nearly reached the station, I had to stop to watch some waiters decorate a restaurant window with a likeness of Gene Tunney made out of a sponge cake, frosting, mayonnaise dressing and passementerie.

Nope, there's no use, I'm doomed to remain a hick!

SALMAGUNDI

The Social Side of Easter

Friendships grow brighter with Easter — the season of rejoicing — the time when thoughts for others spring naturally to mind. Remember your friends with Salmagundi — the chocolates that convey a message.

Salmagundi is a genial merrymaker — a boon companion in festive gatherings — a center of attraction.

This art-metal box of chocolates, with its unusual name, is a social lion among candy-lovers, eclipsed in favor only by the famous Sampler.

Your appreciation of your hostess could not be more gracefully expressed than with a gift of Salmagundi. And sending Salmagundi through the post, to a friend at a distance, is to bestow one of life's pleasant little thrills.

One and two-pound sizes, with special wrap for Easter. The Whitman Agent near you will mail Salmagundi for you, if you wish.

"By Jove!" Said Roosevelt. "It Reads Like the Real Thing!"

to say nothing of two excellent and readable plays: "Van Zorn" and "The Porcupine."

Of this great body of work a critic recently said: "Whoever of his contemporaries misses Mr. Robinson's art misses the key to a treasure of rich experience, for his poetry is one of the most valuable yields which this time shall yield to other time."

Recently, before a log fire in a cottage-like, one-room stone building known as the Veltin Studio (it is situated in an isolated spot on the estate of the Edward MacDowell Association at Peterborough, New Hampshire, I was talking with the man of whom these words were spoken. Passing through the great pine woods on my way to his workshop, I had pondered this question:

Apart from the sheer beauty and spiritual consolation of his art, what is perhaps the one great thing that such an achievement means to us?

Let me say at once that in this first conversation I did not discover what I believe to be the answer; but later I found it; and if you follow this narrative through you too, I think, will see that it is something of great significance to us all. Suffice to say here that this is not merely the story of a long struggle, a high ideal, and a ringing triumph: first and foremost, it is the story of a boy who early found out what he could do, and who forever after followed the Gleam with unswerving faith in himself and his work.

THE biographers of men of genius tell us that not infrequently great and rare achievements are to be foreseen in the events of childhood. So I asked Mr. Robinson about those early years, and this is what I learned:

At seven, he was reading Shakespeare. Like the average youngster of that age, he understood little of what he read. Unlike the average, he got great pleasure from the music of the verse. The plays and the sonnets, which he also read at this time, were a feast. Two years later, at nine, he was becoming critically inclined. He scanned the lines, picking out those over which the bard may have nodded, lines that were incomplete or faulty in other respects.

At eleven, he was writing verses. At sixteen, he was taking himself seriously. Cicero's first oration against Catiline he translated into blank verse just for the pleasure it gave him, and was surprised to find how well it went. He did the same with a long passage from Virgil, and likewise with the whole of Sophocles's "Antigone."

In school he was getting along all right, only he wasn't much for sports. He didn't care particularly for baseball. He liked to go for a walk by himself along the shore of the deep, blue, navigable Kennebec. Rivers always fascinated him.

Of the barn on his father's place he made a kind of retreat. Sometimes he climbed into the hayloft. Sometimes he wrote in the harness-room on the oat bin, or he might sit in the old sleigh when it was stored for the summer. Nobody knew what he was up to. He told no one of the great Fact that had fired his inner consciousness. He thought pretty well of his stuff in a boyish way, but this mood would pass. The same fate overtook it all: it went up in smoke. Of all that he wrote up to his twentieth year not a line survives. Such was the self-exacting discipline imposed upon himself by a stripling, now revered by his fellow artists for the quiet beauties, the august simplicity—the Olympian fire and mirth and sting and gladness—of his verse!

BY THE time he was twenty-three, when he had returned from Harvard and was giving more attention to the technical side of the poetic art under the influence of the versifying physician who lived next door, he had written a great many poems, short and long. Presently he had forty that he thought were worth publishing. "I arranged them in manuscript form," he said, "gave them the title 'The Torrent, and The Night Before,' after the first and last poems, and sent them to a publisher.

"I knew that it was then difficult to get poetry published in America, but I thought that a publisher would be glad to get them. They came back. I was surprised, and hurt a little, I suppose. I sent them out again. Again I was surprised, but not hurt this time. As the manuscript acquired the chronic habit of coming back, I got over being surprised, and got mad. I felt that all that work shouldn't go for nothing. At all events, I wanted to find out who was right, the publishers or I. So I arranged for publication at my own expense through the Riverside Press of Boston."

He was twenty-six when "The Torrent and The Night Before," came out. A little book in blue paper covers, the whole edition of three hundred copies cost fifty dollars. On the fly-leaf of the little blue book appeared these words:

> This book is dedicated to any man, woman, or critic who will cut the edges of it. I have done the top.

"I wouldn't mind if you could forget that dedication," he observed. "It was a cocky thing to do. I must have been conceited and still a little bit mad. Maybe it attracted some attention. Anyhow, the edges on some of them were cut in the course of time."

With a complete library of his own works on hand, the author had a peculiar feeling. For one thing, he wanted to get rid of the books as rapidly as possible. He felt embarrassed. He sent them to literary people, to critics, to magazines and newspapers. Anyone he happened to hear of who was interested in literature got a copy. It wasn't hard to give them away as long as he paid the postage. In a couple of weeks they were all gone except one or two saved for home consumption.

"A trifling incident occurred while I was getting rid of those blue books which had interesting results—for me at least," observed Mr. Robinson. "In Gardiner we had a group of young men who had formed a kind of club. I don't know that we called it a club. Anyhow, we had a meeting place. It was in a room over a store on the main street. We went there to talk and smoke. We talked about literary things, and one of the boys played the fiddle.

"One summer night toward the close of the summer of 1896, our gathering broke up and we trooped down-stairs to find that it was pouring rain. One of my friends said he was going back to hunt his umbrella. I went with him. While he was looking for it, I picked up and read by the light of the gas a little magazine which lay on the table. In it was a quatrain that struck me as pretty good. It was by a Doctor Coan, and his address was given. I didn't know it at the time, but later I learned that he was an editor of a sort, assisting amateur literary aspirants to prepare their compositions for publication.

"Forthwith, I sent Doctor Coan a copy of 'The Torrent and The Night Before.' Back came a letter of the most enthusiastic commendation, one of the most enthusiastic that the blue book got at the time. Among other things, he said that if I ever got down to New York he wanted to get in touch with me."

NOW, this incident, on the surface so trifling, was to have an important bearing on the production of a masterpiece that was to come in the not distant future. Presently, I want to describe the circumstances under which this work came into being; but first let us dispose of the little blue book.

A few reviewing notices were given it almost at once. Some said one thing, some another. The directness of the language, the straightforwardness and simplicity of the subject matter differed widely from the mode of the day. Some implied that the poet was a painter in lugubrious colors; others said: "There is true fire in his verse . . . the swing and the singing of wind and wave, and the passion of human emotion in his lines. . . ."

At all events, the little blue book occupies to-day a position that is all its own. It is exceedingly rare, half of the edition having disappeared. It is one of the most eagerly sought of all modern American first editions. At an auction recently, one faded copy sold for three hundred and seventy-five dollars, nearly eight times the cost of the original three hundred! Still another copy offered for sale by a collector of Americana attracted a purchaser at five hundred dollars, but the offer was declined! So much for one poet's faith in challenging attention for his first little book at his own expense!

Meanwhile, events have taken a turn:

New LOWER PRICES $670 and upwards

Utmost in Motor Car Value

The whole world knows how Chrysler has won public preference in every price field because of vital developments in performance, appearance, comfort, dependability and long life.

And now this leadership becomes more emphatic than ever by Chrysler's new sensational low prices and new sensational values.

Because of Chrysler's unvarying custom of stepping faster than the procession, the world today expects and receives extra quality and extra value in every Chrysler.

As confirmed by ever-climbing sales which have lifted Chrysler from 27th to 3rd place in volume of sales within 42 months, the world is recognizing that the Chrysler spirit of progressiveness positively assures this extra value.

For it is this progressiveness which, since the first Chrysler, has continued to pioneer and develop the worth-while improvements in motor car performance and smartness for the remainder of the industry to emulate and imitate.

See the new Chrysler models—"52," "62," "72" and Imperial "80"—now priced from $670 upwards. Study them in closest detail and note how far they are in advance of all competition. Then make any test you wish, yourself at the wheel. The more exacting your requirements, the more certain your choice of a Chrysler.

New Chrysler "52"—Seven body styles, $670 to $790. Great New Chrysler "62"—Seven body styles, $1065 to $1235. Illustrious New Chrysler "72"—Seven body styles, $1545 to $1795. New 112 h.p. Chrysler Imperial "80"—Fourteen custom body styles by Chrysler, Dietrich, Locke and LeBaron, $2795 to $6795.

All prices f. o. b. Detroit, subject to current Federal excise tax. Chrysler dealers are in a position to extend the convenience of time payments. Ask about Chrysler's attractive plan.

Off .. come Whiskers

Smooth and Clean

when beard is softened at the base

Small Bubble Way

ORDINARY LATHER

Photomicrograph of ordinary lather surrounding single hair. Note how the large bubbles hold air instead of water against the beard.

COLGATE LATHER

Under identical conditions note the closely knit texture of Colgate lather. The small bubbles hold water instead of air against your beard

Bell Boy knew what he wanted! Asked for Small Bubble Lather . . . and he got Colgate's. Razor-pull? Not on your life! There's a world of comfort in a small-bubble shave.

HERE'S a smoother shave, men! Here's speed and comfort too.

A new type of lather, that soaks whiskers soft in a strictly scientific way . . . a lather that makes shaving serene and comfortable without razor-pull, sting or smart.

The secret? Small bubbles. And oh, what a difference they make!

Your face feels clean . . . delightfully refreshed. You can sense the difference instantly . . . see it in your mirror. "Makes your skin feel smooth as velvet" . . . that's what thousands tell us.

Now, to introduce this Colgate product to men who haven't tried it, a test is being offered. See complete details in coupon below.

Colgate lather is designed to absorb more water . . . to scientifically drench your beard with moisture right at the whisker base, where the razor work is done.

You'll see the difference quickly

It's a "small-bubble" lather. For small bubbles hold more water. They carry it closer to the base of your beard.

A glance at the photographs above proves this better than words. Note how the large, air-filled bubbles of ordinary lather fail to settle close to the whisker.

Now contrast them with the closely knit, moisture-laden Colgate bubbles packed close around the whisker.

The minute you lather up with Colgate's, two things happen:

1. The soap in the lather breaks up the oil film that covers each hair . . . floats it quickly away.

2. Then billions of tiny, moisture-laden bubbles seep down through your beard . . . crowd around each whisker . . . soak it soft with water.

Instantly your beard gets moist and pliable . . . limp and lifeless . . . scientifically softened right down at the base . . . ready for the razor.

Thus your whiskers come off clean and smooth. No razor-pull. No stinging and smarting. Twice-over shaves aren't needed now. Your face feels clean, fresh, smooth, invigorated.

Please don't confuse Colgate's with ordinary shave preparations. Once you try it, you'll see the improvement over old-fashioned methods. You've never had a shave like this before. You've never known such comfort . . . never known such smoothness in all your shaving days.

You be the judge . . . for seven days

We'll gladly send a seven-day trial tube of Colgate's to any fair-minded man. Compare it with the shaving cream in your bathroom now.

As an extra dividend we will also send you a sample box of Colgate Talc for Men. Just try it after shaving.

The family fortunes have collapsed upon his father's death. His mother, too, is gone. The home is broken up. The house is sold. Now, in 1900, having previously spent one winter in New York, he goes there to live, making shift to establish himself as a poet upon his share from the sale of the Gardiner home.

In New York, he has his friends—a playwright, a poet or two, a musician, young men who, like himself, were later to become well known. Among them he is known and welcomed as the author of "Children of the Night," his second volume, which a newly established publishing house in Boston had recently brought out; for they sensed the fact that the New Englander's two little books were big with promise.

AND here enters the sequel to that incident mentioned a moment ago: The poet looks up his correspondent, Doctor Coan, the author of that quatrain which had come to his attention one rainy summer's night in '96. And Doctor Coan makes him acquainted with a character named Alfred H. Louis, a man of wit and learning. Mr. Louis is an old man. He sees something in this young poet from Gardiner, Maine, and he puts his finger on it. Mr. Louis has ideas. He talks. He overflows like a mountain of Vesuvian lava.

"Old Mr. Louis!" observed the poet, in a tone reminiscent of great affection. "I should never have known him, and 'Captain Craig' would never have been written except for the accident of my friend's forgetting his umbrella on a rainy night in '96.

"Old shabby bearded, and poor—God knows how poor he was!—God knows how he kept body and soul together!—he looked like a prophet out of the Old Testament. An Englishman, an intellectual Jew, a graduate of Trinity College, and a convert to the Catholic faith, he was versed in the religions and philosophies of all the world, the most learned man I have ever encountered.

"Some way or other he managed to live. Somebody gave him enough to keep him alive. Doctor Coan helped him out, and there were others. One way or another the ravens looked after old Mr. Louis.

"I came to know him well, and to feel that I wanted to perpetuate his personality, that air of greatness which there was about him and which was like a legend, with no date in Circumstance, or Time, or Thing. He is the central figure of 'Captain Craig.' He is Craig. Of course he wasn't a captain of anything. He didn't belong to the Navy, never had sea-faring experience He was a Captain of Souls so to speak, a General of Philosophy, a derelict adrift."

And after time,
When it had come sufficiently to pass
That he was going patch-clad through the streets,
Weak, dizzy, chilled, and half-starved, he had laid
Some nerveless fingers on a prudent sleeve,
And told the sleeve in furtive confidence,
Just how it was: "My name is Captain Craig."
He said, "and I must eat."

The Captain is rescued from starvation by a group of young men in Tilbury Town. Tilbury Town is Gardiner, Maine.

Why changed motoring conditions demand a new margin of safety

Hundreds of pounds lighter but faster than ever

New work for lubrication

The weight of the average automobile today is hundreds of pounds less than five years ago.

But—the burden thus taken off your engine is more than replaced by the increased speed at which the lighter car travels.

And engineers will tell you that it requires three times as much power to pull your car along at 40 miles an hour as at 20 miles an hour.

Today's engines are made to operate at higher compressions, higher temperatures and at higher engine speeds. To protect such engines you must have an engineering margin of safety in your lubricating oil.

Gargoyle Mobiloil will give you that margin of safety. It is the world's quality oil.

We have steadily improved Mobiloil to meet changing motoring conditions.

Our Board of Engineers is constantly in touch with automobile manufacturers in determining the correct grade of Mobiloil for each make and model of car.

This Mobiloil engineering practice is extended to the whole automotive field. It ends all guesswork—makes sure of scientific lubricating. That is why Col. Lindbergh used Mobiloil in his New York-to-Paris flight and on all his flights since—a total of 35,000 miles of flying. In the list of great feats in aviation, no oil stands out like Mobiloil.

Mobiloil went with Commander Byrd to the North Pole, with the U. S. Army Fliers around the world, and with the U. S. Army Fliers on the first successful flight to Hawaii.

On the motor highways today, three out of every four motorists who buy their oil by name ask for Mobiloil. And Mobiloil is by long odds the most popular oil among automotive engineers.

When you buy the correct grade of Mobiloil you will protect your engine with the greatest possible margin of safety that engineering experience can devise.

YOUR guide—If your car is not listed here, see the complete Mobiloil Chart at your dealer's, and remember that . . .

182 automobile and motor truck manufacturers approve it!

The correct grades of Gargoyle Mobiloil for engine lubrication of prominent passenger cars are specified below. Follow winter recommendations in temperatures from 32° F. (freezing) to 0 F. (zero). Below zero use Gargoyle Mobiloil Arctic (except Ford cars Model T, use Gargoyle Mobiloil "E").

So unaware of you . . . and all you do for her

This simple plan will help you guide her

SUDDENLY, with a catch at your heart, you see she's growing up! Your little girl. Already she begins to think she needs you less—now when your guidance means most of all.

Thoughtless about bed time—heedless in her play—capricious at the table. Perhaps it's her finicky, little-girl appetite that troubles you most. Particularly at breakfast.

Because bad habits at breakfast are so wide-spread among children, school and health authorities have made the right sort of breakfast the subject of a nation-wide movement. They are pointing out what mothers long have sensed—the vital need of every child for a hot, cooked cereal breakfast. They have found that children's success in lessons and in games depends upon establishing the habit of a hot, cooked cereal in the morning. Now, in over 70,000 school rooms this rule hangs on the wall:

"Every boy and girl needs a hot cereal breakfast"

Teachers and mothers both say that children with the regular habit of a hot, cooked cereal breakfast are most apt to get the highest marks and do the best at sports. And the child who eats a good hot bowlful of Cream of Wheat in the morning is not tuckered out by night.

Authorities have been recommending Cream of Wheat for over thirty years as the ideal hot, cooked cereal for school children for these reasons:

1. It is rich in the energy-giving food elements needed by little minds and bodies.
2. Cream of Wheat contains none of the harsh, indigestible parts of the wheat, and so is very easily digested.
3. Children love its creamy goodness, easily varied by stirring in raisins, dates or prunes while cooking.

While she's still a little girl, do this simple thing that will help her grow up well and strong. To rouse enthusiasm for the hot, cooked cereal breakfast—try the plan described below. Start her out regularly with a good hot bowl of Cream of Wheat. Your grocer has it. Cream of Wheat Company, Minneapolis, Minn. In Canada, made by Cream of Wheat Company, Winnipeg. English address, Fassett & Johnson, Ltd., 86 Clerkenwell Road, London, E. C. 1.

FREE—Mothers say this plan works wonders*

A plan that makes your children want to eat a hot, cooked cereal breakfast regularly. A youngster's club, with badges and a secret, with gold stars and colored wall charts. All material free—sent direct to your children together with a sample box of Cream of Wheat. Also a new enlarged edition of the booklet, "The Important Business of Feeding Children." Just mail coupon to Dept. P-13, Cream of Wheat Co., Minneapolis, Minn.

The young men frequent a club known as the "Chrysalis," where one Morgan plays the fiddle and Killigrew and the learned Plunket make remarks. As though to requite this kindness, the Captain not only expounds philosophically upon occasion, but delivers his opinions of these young men and their activities, and their literary efforts, all "with a tuneful ooze of rhetoric."

"Old Mr. Louis knew of the use to which I put him," observed Mr. Robinson. "He read the manuscript. He laughed and was immensely pleased. He was tickled, as I have no doubt his ghost will be to-day by this association of him with the original of Captain Craig. He never saw Tilbury Town, of course. The other characters in the poem, who also were taken somewhat from the life, never saw him. It just pleased me to place him in that environment. And if anyone, reading 'Craig' to-day, should feel that the Tilbury boys, while feeding the Captain crusts and keeping life in his half-starved body, throve prodigiously on his philosophic outpourings, thus receiving far more than they gave, I should be glad. It is a thought I meant to put there."

Now "Captain Craig," which has often been referred to as the finest long poem ever written by an American, which has already stood the test of a quarter-century, and which can never die as long as there are critics to discern the excellent, was written in Cambridge and New York; and soon after this the author went to Yonkers. Perhaps someone had told him that writing poetry was cheaper in the suburbs than in the metropolis. Funds were low, exceedingly low, almost gone. Here in Yonkers he had a room in a humble house, in a narrow, congested street, opposite a factory. The floor of the room was covered with linoleum. There was a stove. A big, fat, good-natured landlady came in to buzz and poke about. Also, there was a table, draped with a red-checked cloth, on which he both dined and wrote.

When "Craig" was finished, there arose this question: Who was going to publish a thing like that? Composed in the smooth-running, lean, keen, strong, invincible lines of blank verse, and otherwise daring in a technical sense, it was new, revolutionary. Who, indeed, would publish it? As for the answer, it was not forthcoming immediately.

THE young poet is back in New York now, in a room in West Twenty-third Street, between Ninth and Tenth Avenues. Broke, without a cent, he is hunting odd jobs, and now and then missing a meal. "A job? Sure! We want a man as time-keeper on the subway."

This was the job with which Fate met the extremity. They had started building subways in 1900. It is now the fall of 1902, and the subway is finished as far up as Fifty-ninth Street. Meanwhile, a friend, having read "Captain Craig," had predicted that he could find a publisher, and he does so. So at just the time when "Craig" comes out, to be discovered, discussed, praised, appreciated, and likewise attacked and misunderstood, the poet goes to work at two dollars a day.

Keeping track in his time-book of the little brass numbers which the laborers wear, he proceeds south in the subway ex-

Dermutation does it!

Until you use Mennen, you have yet to know dermutation. And until you know dermutation you have yet to realize the perfect shave—for dermutation is that special property in Mennen Shaving Cream which softens and mollifies the toughest beard; which relaxes and levels the microscopic skin peaks at the base of each hair, so that the razor glides swiftly and smoothly without nicking or scraping these tiny mounds. No soreness; no rawness; no burning; no free alkali. And Mennen lather contains five grateful, soothing emollients which tone up the skin, leaving it soft and smooth for hours to come. Made both with and without menthol.

For after shave:

There's a dash of brisk coolness in Mennen Skin Balm that's a delightful accessory to the perfect shave. And Mennen Talcum for Men with its neutral invisible tint tones down that full-moon, shiny-face effect so objectionable to everybody. The Mennen Company, Newark, N. J., and Toronto, Ontario.

cavation from One Hundred and Thirty-seventh Street to Seventy-second, then north to One Hundred and Fifty-ninth Street. It is winter and chillingly damp. . . . The walking is through wet places not always discernible by the light of an oil lantern; but mainly the trouble is that, while his feet are in the subway, his head is among the stars.

That winter and the following summer he plugs away. Part of the time he is "checker," keeping count of the loads of crushed stone carted away from scows at the river front for use in ballasting the tracks. As for "Craig," it's a sort of success. What the French call succès d'estime, a literary success of a high order without much money in it. Seven or eight hundred copies are sold; then, for a time, it drops out of sight. As for the subway, it is finished up to One Hundred and Fifty-ninth Street, and the poet's job gives out.

And now he is in Boston, living in a small hall bedroom in Yarmouth Street, just off Columbus Avenue. Another job, a white-collar job! He is writing advertisements for a department store, and the job pays about ten a week, but enough to keep him going after a fashion. He writes an "ad." Then he writes a poem. He has resumed work on "An Island (St. Helena, 1821)," a dramatic monologue which he had given up while working in the subway. At this time, also, he wrote that ravishing thing of sudden falls and sweet accents, "For a Dead Lady," which later an English critic praised so highly. And the months go by. One way or another he is always pegging away. . . .

A CHANGE of scene! And a rainbow over the poet's destiny! A boy in attendance at the Groton School goes home on his vacation. In Washington, D. C., he lives in a house on which the eyes of all Americans turn continuously—the White House. And this young enthusiast is filled with the literary news that has been engrossing the attention of his circle at school. The boys at the school have been reading a book. It's by a certain young New England poet. There's an instructor in the school who came from the same town as the poet, who has praised it.

As the President of the United States, the father of the schoolboy enthusiast, listened to the tale of a new poet in the land, there came a flash of amused interest behind his eyeglasses. "I'll be glad to see what your poet's got," he said sympathetically. "I'll take a look the first chance I get!" And the boy tendered a copy of the book, which he had brought with him from school.

Late that same afternoon, coming in from a horseback ride in Potomac Park, the President, still wearing his riding clothes and brown leather puttees, dropped into a chair and picked up the book. Turning the pages, he read a little here and there. He became absorbed. He had thought to glance through it in a couple of minutes; but he didn't lay it down till an hour later, when he had read it all through.

There were things in it that struck him hard. "By Jove!" he exclaimed on one occasion. "It's something I'd missed. It reads like the real thing." The more he heard of the new poet from his son the more interested he became. Just who is this poet? How old? How is he making

Metal Motors and Human Hearts

Hour after hour news was anxiously awaited. It seemed incredible that a man could fly 3,610 miles without stopping. Could any motor stand such a test? . . . But two motors carried that plane to France. One of metal, the other—the most wonderfully designed motor in the world—a human heart.

LIKE the metal motor, the human motor must keep going. When the human motor starts to "miss" and then stops, life's flight is ended. Yet, oftentimes, with no attention and more abuse than was ever given any motor invented by man the heart "carries on". Even when damaged or diseased it carries a heavy load—an overload—with little complaint. If the heart complained more it would probably have better care.

Whether defective at birth or damaged by disease, it keeps at work—day and night—doing its best to make a brave "non-stop" record. Strong hearts need rest and intelligent protection. Weak hearts must have their loads lightened or they will be forced to give up.

Thanks to modern science everybody can find out how big or how little a load of work, strain and exercise his heart can carry. Many of the most useful men and women in the world can look forward to serene and happy old age despite damaged hearts because they have found out what their hearts can do and what they cannot do.

Briefly, while there are many different kinds of heart difficulties, they may be roughly divided into three general groups. First, the heart troubles of young people caused by diseases of childhood. Rheumatic fever and rheumatism (associated with "growing pains", tonsillitis, and stiff and painful joints) cause heart disease. According to some experts, diphtheria, scarlet fever and measles may injure children's hearts. Second, heart diseases of middle-aged people resulting from syphilis, or focal infection in teeth, tonsils, sinuses or elsewhere. Third, heart ailments of old people ultimately resulting from these and many other causes, including unhygienic living habits.

Many persons have defective hearts without realizing the fact, but there are many others who suspect that they have heart trouble when they are suffering from a different cause. There need be no guess work. Know your own heart. Have your doctor examine it regularly. If it is normal and strong, do not shorten its term of usefulness by overstrains or excesses. If it is damaged or weakened, live in accordance with your doctor's advice.

Give your heart a fair chance. Take care of it so that it will carry you safely on a "non-stop flight" to a happy old age.

Heart disease is now the chief of the captains of death. It has risen to this position in the past twenty-five years, surpassing tuberculosis, pneumonia and other diseases. The danger of dying from a bad heart has increased every year, while that from most other deadly diseases has decreased. Under present conditions, one in every five will ultimately die of heart disease in one form or another.

The increase in the deathrate from this disease in recent years has been primarily in middle life and at the older ages. While the great majority of those who succumb are relatively old people, there are altogether too many young ones. One out of every seven who dies from heart disease passes away before the age of 45.

Physicians, statisticians and others who are studying heart disease suspect that much of it is induced by the hurrying mode of life so general in this country.

The Metropolitan Life Insurance Company has prepared a pamphlet entitled, "Strong Hearts" which sets forth the principal facts about this disease. It may be the means of saving you from serious trouble. A copy will be mailed free by our booklet department. Send for it.

out? Can he make a living off his verses? These inquiries the President pursued further, among editors and others; and on a certain occasion, leaning over a luncheon table in the White House, he pointed a finger at a celebrated editor, and said: "Now what about this man Robinson? He's a genius in his way! What can be done for him?" . . .

IT IS the close of a dark, drizzly, miserable day in Boston in the spring of 1905. In that little hall bedroom in Yarmouth Street, the poet gets up from his work table to go to dinner. In the dark hall he picks up a large square envelope which looks like an advertising circular. After tossing it inside, where it lands on his table, he goes 'round the corner to a "joint" where he can get dinner for twenty-five cents. On his return, he is sitting beside the table when his eye lights on the "circular." There's something curious about it. In the upper left-hand corner are the words "The White House." Within, a note consisting of a few typewritten lines.

It was a bolt straight from the blue. The note spoke briefly of certain qualities in the poet's work that had struck the writer, and went straight to the point. "What are you doing now?" said the note. "Would you like something to do?" And the note was signed in the familiar characteristic script of Theodore Roosevelt.

"The thing that astonished me," observed Mr. Robinson, "was that the President of the United States should be able to find the time to dig up a young poet out of the rather dark obscurity that veiled him from view and to think of ways to help. It wasn't so astonishing that he should be disposed to help. He was that kind of man. There were depths in his nature which, during his lifetime, he was not too often credited with.

"After I had informed the President that I should be glad of a chance to do anything at which I could make a living, there was some talk, I believe, of making me an immigration inspector with a location in some foreign country. However, I preferred American soil, and New York to any other place. Presently I was informed of an opening in the Special Agent's Office of the Customs House."

Now the book which had stirred the President's interest in the poet was not "Captain Craig," but his second volume, "Children of the Night." It made its appearance in a second edition just as the poet took up his job in the Customs House. Among the reviewers who noticed it this time was the President himself. "There's an undoubted touch of genius in it," he said, writing in a literary periodical. "It is full of a curious simplicity and good faith." In another sentence he threw down this challenge: "Whether he has the power of sustained flight remains to be seen." And he added this: "It is curious that Mr. Robinson's volume should not have attracted more attention."

Curious, indeed, if it didn't attract more attention now!

We hurry on to a splendid culmination. Four years in the Customs House. It is not a prolific period, but is sufficient for the harvesting of one more volume, "The Town Down the River." For this the President was instrumental in finding a publisher. It was the first of the poet's books to be published with no strings tied to the financial arrangement. Dedicated to Theodore Roosevelt, it contained two poems on two Presidents, "The Master" (Abraham Lincoln), and "The Revealer" (Roosevelt).

In 1910, Mr. Robinson left the Customs House to give his whole time to writing. A fortunate legacy tided him over for a while. In 1911, he went to work at the MacDowell Colony, Peterborough, New Hampshire. Here he has worked continuously, four or five months of the year, and here he demonstrated that he had the power of sustained flight. "It is to the Colony," he observed, "that I owe the opportunity I had always wanted, and never expected to get—the chance for sustained, uninterrupted work. I am certain that many of my books never would have materialized except for what we have come to call 'the Peterborough idea'."

IT WAS in 1916, with the publication of "The Man Against the Sky," that he first became a national figure. With that, the popularity of his work began to increase until now his sales rival those of some of our popular novelists. On his fiftieth birthday, in 1919, sixteen American poets of the highest distinction paid him tributes through the press, crowning him their peer with the laurel of affection and admiration. Various awards have come to him. In 1921, a volume containing all his verse published up to that time ("Collected Poems") was awarded the Pulitzer Prize, and was also selected by the Authors' Club as the most significant contribution to American literature that same year.

"Weren't you surprised by the way it all came out?" I asked.

"There were times when it seemed that the day would never break," was the response. "But remember one thing: When a man has something that he very much wants to do, something that matters a great deal to him, whether or not it does to anybody else, he isn't likely to think so very much about the outcome. If a thing of that kind once gets hold of you it isn't hard to work without recognition or encouragement. I was always fortunate in being able to do my work in my own way, with the confidence that the end would take care of itself."

"It takes more even than faith of that sort to make a poet," I observed.

"The secret of it all, it seems to me, lies in this: Behind any achievement worth calling by the name, you will find a man who, in some way or other, early or late, has hit upon what he can do. People should find out what they can do—which is something that many people never discover at all.

"But watch any man who is swimming along, making a go of his enterprise. The chances are that he likes it. Presumably, it goes because he likes it. Take George M. Cohan, who is undoubtedly a genius in his field. He likes what he is doing; he does it well; he communicates that liking to all of us."

"A MOMENT ago you said that you were sixteen when you came to the conclusion that you were to be a poet. Was that when you found out what you could do?"

"Whenever it was that I began really to write. After that I never doubted it would come out all right, if I kept at it.

"I felt as certain that this was what I should try to do as any boy who has been expecting from his earliest memory to follow his father's footsteps into the law. My conviction was that my contribution, if any, was to be in artistic form. It was just a Fact, with a capital F perhaps. I wasn't particularly elated by the prospect. I had read enough to know that writing poetry didn't mean a bed of roses. Rather, I felt that I was 'in for it.' But I wasn't frightened. It seemed like a gigantic venture. I anticipated hardships. Looking back, I'm surprised that they weren't much greater than they proved to be."

And it strikes me that here is the great lesson for all who would try and do. Have you ever driven down a hill, and seen on the opposite side of the valley another hill rising sheer and precipitous, so steep that it seemed, at a distance, impossible to ascend? But as you approached, how that hill flattened out! How much easier than it looked! So it is in conquering most of our objectives. The man who, in pondering the difficulties, stays at a distance, sees them magnified. The man who goes on, taking one step after another to overcome them, sees them grow less. So, obstacles are leveled and great ventures accomplished. That hill across the valley is steeper before you get there than ever it will be once you've begun the ascent!

"There is this to be said," observed Mr. Robinson: "I don't believe that a man can do with great success anything that is much above or below his natural abilities. However, if a man has the innate ability to do a specific thing, there is a fair chance that he will will to do it, and try hard. Vice versa, if he wants to do it so much that he will try hard, that may almost be taken as a sure sign that he has the ability to do it.

"Heredity has a good deal to do with it—perhaps everything, when it comes to the arts. In the great shuffle of transmitted characteristics, traits, abilities, and aptitudes, the man who fixes on something definite in life that he must do, at the expense of anything else, if necessary, has presumably got something that, for him, should be recognized as the Inner Fire. For him, that is the Gleam, the Vision and the Word! He'd better follow it. The greatest adventure he'll ever have on this side is following where it leads."

DOES a young fellow have as much chance to rise now as his father had? "More!" says W. W. Atterbury, president of the Pennsylvania Railroad. That's what you would expect a big executive to say, isn't it? Well, Atterbury does more than say it—he cites actual facts, and gives definite reasons why the young man of to-day has a better chance, mathematically and otherwise, to rise to a big position. This article, which will be printed next month, is packed with real stuff.

Glistening Clean Teeth

since Childhood Days

Her Reward...for this Daily Dental Care

Miss Marguerite Fish has used this cleansing dental Cream for nearly twenty years. And today her flashing, brilliant teeth are envied wherever she goes.

We persuaded Miss Fish to sit for this portrait just to show you how beautiful her teeth are today, after using Colgate's for nearly twenty years.

CLEAN!

Years ago we set out to make the best dentifrice possible. We interviewed leading dental authorities. They told us that the one thing a dentifrice should do is to clean teeth. We then produced Ribbon Dental Cream—designing it to do that one thing superlatively well. It is not medicated, because all experiments in the meantime have sustained the original principle that cleansing is the only thing a dentifrice can do.

EVER since she was a little girl, Marguerite Fish has used this one dental cream . . . and you should see her beautiful teeth today.

We wish you could meet Miss Fish personally. You'd be fascinated by her charming personality . . . her glorious flashing smile.

Her teeth are famous for their beauty—admired wherever she goes. A glance at the portrait above will give you an idea of their loveliness. Note how they glorify her smile.

Ask Miss Fish the secret, and she will tell you the daily use of Colgate's. She has used it for almost twenty years.

"Colgate's certainly keeps your teeth in sound, healthy condition," says the dentist to Miss Fish.

In this country, and in foreign countries the world over, you will find thousands and thousands of men and women who began using Colgate's ten, fifteen, even twenty years ago, and whose teeth today are exceptionally sound and beautiful.

Many of these people are grateful enough to write us. Some send their photographs also. Each day the postman brings a few more letters to add to an already bulging file. Many of these letters come from users who have brushed with Colgate's for at least a decade. We could fill the pages of this magazine with quotations from them—sincere, unsolicited reports from people proud of the soundness and attractiveness of their teeth.

There is nothing mysterious about these enviable results. These people did nothing that you cannot easily do.

They visited their dentist for periodic inspections. And they used Colgate's Ribbon Dental Cream.

Choose your dentifrice on the basis of results. Follow the lead of those who have already kept their teeth sound for years. Simply adopt for your own use the dentifrice most popular among people with well-preserved teeth.

On the one hand you have Colgate's, the chief and only feature of which is thorough cleansing. On the other, you have the fact that countless people who have used Colgate's for years now have exceptionally fine teeth.

In such a vital matter as the care of your teeth, could there be any safer guide than the actual experiences of people like yourself?

Also wouldn't it be an immense satisfaction to know that the dentifrice you were using was the one which dentists recommend most frequently?

So for lovely teeth—for teeth that make your smile the social and business asset that it should be—ask your druggist today for Colgate's. Or, if you prefer, try the free sample offered below.

Colonel Braxton Chooses a Client

Fort Pitt, to be wielded with one hand. And instantly Colonel Braxton realized the tragedy of the thing. . . .

But why Orlandus Wood and himself called in?

Mr. Ridgewood Carter went forward with his explanation of this disorder.

He had hurried here at his sister's death, and after the burial had taken possession of the place, as was his right under the will she left. Colonel Braxton was probably familiar with that will.

It devised the house and lands to him, and an heirloom of old plate to the distant niece, Miss Sarah Carrington.

He indicated the violated cupboard on the east side of the fireplace at the south end of the room. His sister had stored the plate in that cupboard, and had caused it to be nailed up. And so it had remained. It was a foolish thing to do. She had been advised again and again to remove it to a place of safety. But she had refused. And it had remained in this wooden cupboard, protected only by the nailed-up door.

There was perhaps no great danger while the ancient woman lived, for the thing was secret. But at her death, when the will was published, it was known. And, like a tale of hidden treasure, it traveled fast and far and accumulated exaggeration. It would come quickly to the knowledge of the desperadoes of the river—gathering a fictitious, lurid value.

Last night, under cover of the storm, some company of brigands from a river boat, who had evidently got knowledge of the thing, had landed here, entered the house and accomplished the robbery.

Mr. Ridgewood Carter, sleeping in a distant portion of the house, had not heard them.

The thunder and the rain were continuous. The storm fell about midnight and raged with no break in violence of noise and rain until almost dawn. It was quite certain that the man's statement was here in agreement with the fact. He knew nothing of the robbery until he came down in the morning, and then he had at once sent for Miss Sarah Carrington, her attorney, and Colonel Braxton.

COLONEL BRAXTON felt the depression of the pit about him.

He looked at the speaker, clearly, from all evidences, stating the truth, and at Mr. Orlandus Wood. . . . But at the girl, silent and motionless on the horsehair-covered sofa, he could not look. She was so helpless before this disaster, so young, so innocent, so unsuspicious of the world of men.

And, like youth, in its virginity of the morning, she failed to realize all that it must inevitably mean to lose this inheritance. There was no bitterness and no anxiety in her face, only a puzzled sweetness, as of a child that does not understand.

And suddenly, with a clear extended vision, Colonel Braxton knew who it was that he represented in this matter.

Mr. Ridgewood Carter went forward

New discoveries await you in the Airman

Convertible Coupe

Another Exclusive Superiority Feature—light unsprung weight—the weight of all parts below the springs. With scientific light-weight construction, the pounding of the road is greatly reduced—the chassis absorbing part of the shocks, the springs taking care of the balance—and the body riding easily and smoothly.

THIS year—more than ever before—automobile buyers realize that if a car is to be out-of-the-ordinary, it must be built specifically to achieve that distinction.

Aviation's spectacular endorsement of air-cooling affords the latest indication that Franklin possesses exclusive superiorities in performance. The powerful Airman motor has the zooming pickup of the airplane. A touch of the accelerator sends the car dashing ahead, eager to display its flashing ability. Road emergencies are always met with a liberal reserve of power.

And the exclusiveness of the Airman's motor extends equally to the car's handling, riding comfort and beauty. High speed can be maintained for hours on end—with no overheating or injury to the motor—and with absolute comfort for driver and passengers. Balancing this speed are synchronized, 4-wheel, hydraulic brakes to assure positive action and utmost security at all times. Scientific light-weight construction and Franklin's unique spring suspension make for a fuller, more restful comfort.

There are now thousands of experienced motorists ready to advise you not to select your next car, until you have ridden in "the most comfortable mile-a-minute car ever built"—and investigated the favorable terms on which Airman ownership may be arranged.

JOHN B. STETSON COMPANY, PHILADELPHIA

"World's foremost makers of fine hats" with his explanations. He seemed concerned that Colonel Braxton should see all the evidences for himself. He went out onto the lawn and along the track of the desperadoes to the river. Colonel Braxton followed, with the girl and Mr. Orlandus Wood.

It was all precisely as Ridgewood Carter had described it.

The trackage of a landing party was all about the lawn and at the water's edge. An old, decayed boat, moored to the bank and held in place at its stern by a rusted chain anchored in the river, had been used as a landing place by the thieves. There was mud about the inside of the boat, as of many feet, and the rusted chain had been dragged across the rear board as by the lurch and motion of some craft pulled up against it. It was all quite clear:

The thieves, on the mission of this robbery, had pulled out from the river, landed alongside this abandoned craft, fastened their boat to it, gone about their depredation, and, returning, embarked from this old boat, as from a sort of wharf —on their way to New Orleans with the loot.

BUT Colonel Braxton had now a new and urgent interest in this affair, and he considered it as he would consider a desperate case turned over to him in a court of law.

He looked sharply at every evidence. He scrutinized minutely every detail. But he said nothing, and he gave no physical expression of this new and commanding direction that had descended on him.

It was Mr. Orlandus Wood who spoke at some length, when they had come again into the house. He sat down before the desk-board of the secretary and drew out a legal paper, newly written, on which the ink was scarcely dry; and which to complete required only the signatures of the parties.

"Colonel," he said, "you will be surprised and pleased at the ultimate issue of this affair, as I have myself been surprised and pleased. A great loss of an inheritance to Miss Sarah Carrington has, by the generosity of this gentleman, Mr. Ridgewood Carter, been turned about to the gain of an estate of something like an equal value."

He paused, and fell into a recital of the facts:

"You are cognizant of this affair; how the testatrix, the aged Martha Carter, by her will, devised this house and land to her brother here, and a quantity of plate to her distant niece, Miss Sarah Carrington. I have before me in her hand, the items. And if those items were correct, sir, there was the value of a fortune in that plate.

"It was the accumulation of a great family in its day, imported out of England, the valued pieces of the greatest silversmiths of Europe. An inheritance, sir, not to be equaled in its kind. And not to be left dependent for its safety to the nailed-up door of a wooden closet. But the eccentric decedent so left it, and, naturally, when the rumor of it got about, the thing happened that must inevitably happen in such a case."

He made a gesture toward the broken closet and the hatchet lying against the wall, where the robbers had struck in to pry off the door.

In 16 years we have not published a more dramatic story than this

This is the story of a man who almost threw $10,000 into the waste basket because he did not have curiosity enough to open the pages of a little book. (Have you read one single book in the past month that increased your business knowledge or gave you a broader business outlook?)

The scene took place in a bank in one of the southern cities of California. The Vice-president, who had sent for a representative of the Alexander Hamilton Institute, said to him:

"I want your help in making a little private experiment among the junior officers of this bank. We have got to appoint a new cashier. I hate to bring a man in from the outside, and yet I am not at all sure that any one of our younger men is ready for the position. Here are the names of five of them. I want you to send a copy of "Forging Ahead in Business" to each one, but without letting them suspect that I have had a hand in it. Then call and tell the story of the Institute's training to each one separately and let me know how he receives it.

"I enrolled for your Course in New York years ago," he explained. "It gave me my first real knowledge of the fundamental principles of business. It meant everything to me, and I have an idea that there is no better way to test a man's business judgment than to see how he reacts to the opportunity it offers."

The five copies of "Forging Ahead in Business" were mailed, and a few days later the representative of the Institute called. One of the five men was on a vacation; three had tossed the book into the waste basket. They "knew all about it already"; they were "not interested." The fifth had his copy on his desk unopened. To that fifth man the Institute representative said:

"You may not suspect it, but there is a check for $10,000 in that little book."

"Don't kid me," the other answered.

"I'm serious," was the reply. "I'll see you tomorrow."

The following morning the Institute man was called on the 'phone. "I think I found that $10,000 check last night," said the man at the bank. "If you're down this way today, drop in. I'd like to enrol."

A few months later the directors of the bank appointed him cashier: his upward progress had begun. One of the first friends whom he notified of his promotion was the Institute representative.

"It gives me a cold shudder," he said, "to remember that I was just on the point of throwing that little book into the waste basket—$10,000 and all."

Few men realize how eagerly business leaders are looking for the heads that stick up above the mass—for the men who by any sort of special training or ability have marked themselves for larger things.

For business nowadays develops the specialist—the man who knows his own department well, but who is so close to his job that he hasn't had time to learn the broad fundamental principles upon which all business is built.

Do you want more money? Ask yourself this: "Why should anyone pay me more next year than this year? Just for living? Just for avoiding costly blunders? I am devoting most of my waking time to business—what am I doing to make myself more expert at business?"

Here is the Institute's function in a nutshell: It first of all awakens your interest in business, stimulates your desire to know, makes business a fascinating game. And second, it puts you into personal contact with leaders, thrills you by their example, makes you powerful with their methods. Is it any wonder, then, that Institute men stand out above the crowd?

Thousands of men will read this page. Hundreds will turn aside, or cast it into the waste basket, as those three men in the California bank threw their copies of "Forging Ahead in Business" into the waste basket. But a few hundred will be stirred by that divine emotion—curiosity—which is the beginning of wisdom. They will send for "Forging Ahead"; they will read it, and, like the fifth man, will find a fortune in its pages.

"I said to him, 'There is a check for $10,000 hidden in that book.'"

"Now, sir,"—and he went on in his legal voice—"the ordinary man of business in our selfish time would have left Miss Carrington to her loss; but not so this considerate and generous gentleman. He feels—and I can understand the pressure of that feeling—that, as this plate was in his custody and care, he is responsible to Miss Sarah Carrington for its safety. And as it is lost to her, he must make good that loss as far as he is able."

He moved the legal paper before him with his hand.

"And so he has sent for Miss Sarah Carrington and her counsel, and for you, to convey to her by deed this house and lands in lieu of this plate that cannot be delivered. . . . I arrived before you, and I have drawn the instrument. I think, sir, you will find it in form and valid. And I shall be obliged if you will approve it; as representing Mr. Ridgewood Carter in this affair."

The reply of Colonel Braxton surprised Mr. Orlandus Wood:

"I CANNOT represent Mr. Ridgewood Carter."

And, putting his hand into his pocket, he took out the five gold pieces and presented them to the man.

Colonel Braxton was standing in the center of the room facing toward the river.

Mr. Wood sat at the secretary; the girl was again in her place on the haircloth sofa, directly to the right of Carter, who stood behind her with his back to the violated doors. When Colonel Braxton advanced toward him with the money he did not move, but he put out his hand that was farthest from the girl and took the gold pieces.

He murmured some expression of vague courtesy, but he did not fall into a formal speech. It was Mr. Orlandus Wood who struck into that. He turned on the lawyer in amazement:

"You cannot represent this gentleman. . . . Why not?"

"Because," replied Colonel Braxton, "I represent another."

"Another!" he echoed in astonishment. "What other?"

When Colonel Braxton spoke, his voice was firm, even, and decisive.

"I appear," he said, "for the guardian of Miss Sarah Carrington."

Wood flung about in his chair.

"A guardian? I did not know that she had a guardian!"

"Why, yes," replied Colonel Braxton, "Miss Sarah Carrington has a guardian, and I am here to represent him."

He came over to the table and took up the deed that Mr. Orlandus Wood had written.

"This indenture," he said, "is in form. The consideration of one dollar and love and affection is valid in the law. It has my approval, and I shall be glad to have Mr. Carter sign it. I suggest only a formal change in the body of it. It recites that the title to the plate, if recovered, or to any part thereof, so recovered, shall vest in the grantee, Mr. Ridgewood Carter."

Wood interrupted:

"You see, Colonel, this plate will be taken to New Orleans by these river thieves, for disposal there. It is Mr. Carter's intention to follow at once and see if he can recover any part of it. But he can have no right to undertake that, unless the title to the plate is in him. He cannot send back thirteen hundred miles for Miss Sarah Carrington to establish her ownership in this plate. You will understand why the deed contains this provision."

Colonel Braxton made a gesture of assent.

"Yes," he said, "I understand why the deed contains this provision. . . . And you are quite right, sir, in your general observation on it.

"But I will ask you to put it in a little different form, in order that this precise intent may be clear in its meaning to all men. Write it, sir, that if the plate, or any part thereof, be recovered in any jurisdiction beyond the boundaries of Virginia, the title shall so vest in Mr. Ridgewood Carter. This will accomplish the purpose that you have in mind, and it will give this deed that wholly generous aspect that Mr. Carter would have it carry on its face."

Mr. Orlandus Wood made a gesture of assent.

"If you wish the clause so written," he replied, with a judicial air, "I see no reason to deny you. There is merit in your observation; for I may add, as outside the deed, that it has been all along this gentleman's intention, as he so advised us, to return the plate to Miss Carrington, if he is fortunate enough to find it. But he wished to make that donation as a gift, and not as an obligation of this indenture. I may add that, in some experience of affairs, I have never known a nobler attitude to be taken by any gentleman of our time."

He paused and took up the pen.

"I will interline the deed as you suggest. It will serve, as you so wisely see, to make clear and unequivocal the generous intention that is moving Mr. Ridgewood Carter in this affair."

THE man standing behind the girl did not reply, but he began to pace backward and forward behind the sofa. By reason of the slightly shorter right leg, he had acquired the habit of putting down the toe of that foot first and making the toe thus do service for the foot. The habit took up the inequality, but it gave the man's step a certain strained preciseness. His face was in reflection, and out of the corner of his eye he followed Colonel Braxton.

That attorney moved about the room while Wood interlined his deed. He went over to the cupboard and looked closely at the splintered door, and at the hatchet lying on the floor against the wall where the thieves after the breaking had thrown it down. There was nothing about this implement by which the owner could be established.

Colonel Braxton turned back and came leisurely toward the table at which the attorney wrote. He regarded the man pacing behind the sofa, and suddenly, as though a light were flashed into a darkened corner, he recalled him. He did not pause nor was there a change in a feature of his face. But on the instant he had a great upward sweep of the heart.

It was not for nothing that the Guardian of Miss Sarah Carrington had sent him here this day!

"AROUND THE TIME of my high school graduation, I became run down. Too many parties and dances, I guess—and then there was the Senior play. The vice-principal urged me to withdraw from the play. But I didn't want to do that.

"It happened that my father was an ardent Yeast enthusiast. I decided to try it myself. To my surprise I was better within a month, and in two months I was entirely well. "BY THE TIME I was fifteen years old I had run away from home so often that my mother gave up trying to keep me there.

"After working my way around the world on tramp steamers I entered college, where I specialized in journalism. But the pressure of study and overtraining in athletics brought back my old enemy, indigestion.

"When I graduated I was suffering from a bad case of 'nerves'—practically a breakdown. But heeding a suggestion of an athletic trainer I began eating three cakes daily of Fleischmann's Yeast.

"In three or four months I was well—my nerves as steady as the iron in the construction jobs on which I worked for a time after leaving college. I am writing short stories and articles now, and giving boxing instruction. But I am still eating Yeast—to keep myself in shape." Frederick D. Wade

FLEISCHMANN'S YEAST is not a medicine but a food—wholesome, fresh as any vegetable.

Yet this food has unusual virtue in correcting certain common ills—indigestion, skin troubles, headaches, "nerves." Ills such as these generally come from an unclean intestinal tract. Fleischmann's Yeast keeps the intestines active, clean. Softens the wastes. Strengthens sluggish muscles. Brings healthful "regularity."

Mr. Orlandus Wood finished with his interlineation, rose and beckoned the grantee to the chair before the table. Carter came over without a word and sat down before the secretary. He spread out the legal paper with the hand toward Colonel Braxton, and with the other dipped the pen into the ink and wrote his name.

He had come to a decision in his pace behind the sofa and he went forward, with no hesitation and no comment.

But he was not wholly at his ease.

"I trust, sir," he said, addressing Colonel Braxton, "that this deed of gift here will be agreeable to the guardian of Miss Sarah Carrington, whom you represent."

Colonel Braxton replied at once and with a gracious gesture:

"I can assure you, sir, that it is entirely in conformity to his will."

"And I hope, sir," the man continued! "that he will understand precisely my motive in this act."

And again Colonel Braxton answered:

"He will precisely understand it!"

CARTER rose from his chair. But he was not at ease, even after these courteous assurances.

And he began to consider what in this affair he could have overlooked. He thought that he had acted with a care beyond any human hazard, not only within the law but within the generous conceptions of all men of honor. He could see no flaw, and yet this inscrutable attorney somehow strangely disturbed him.

Mr. Orlandus Wood came forward, sat down at the table and wrote out the acknowledgment of the grantee in form and as required by the statutes of Virginia. He dried the ink with a little sand sifted over it, folded the deed and placed it in his pocket. He got up then, buttoned his frock coat, and took up his top hat from a chair.

"I believe," he said, "this matter is now concluded."

He looked toward Mr. Ridgewood Carter and extended his hand toward his client, as though with a formal courtesy he would lead her to her carriage. But Colonel Braxton stopped him.

"You are not going away without the plate?"

"The plate!" echoed Wood.

"Why, yes," replied Colonel Braxton. "Miss Carrington will wish to take the plate."

The amazed attorney swung 'round on his heels.

"Then you have a clue to this robbery?"

Colonel Braxton looked at the man, as in a vague wonder.

"A clue!" he said. "Why, sir, there is here the very signature of the man set down in his act. I have observed it in a hundred cases. There is no escape from it. The criminal agent leaves always his individual distinguishing mark behind him in his work. He signs it, sir, as the artist signs his picture, or the sculptor chisels his name on his monument. . . . We have only to look at it with a little care to read the name. . . .

"Come with me to this broken closet."

They went with him to the far end of the room by the splintered door. Colonel Braxton took up the hatchet lying on the floor and stepped into the corner before the violated closet.

"You will observe," he said, "that the door to this closet was forced by driving the blade of this hatchet into the crack where it is hinged to the east wall of this room; precisely at the right angle which this closet door makes with this east wall. You will notice, further, that these heavy blows of the hatchet drove the blade straight and directly into this crack of the door.

"Therefore, the one wielding this implement stood directly in front of this crack in the door when he made the assault on it, and, therefore, he was standing close against this east wall of the room facing this corner where the door is hinged. . . . The marks of the hatchet blade, as I have said, go straight, deep and directly into the crack of the door in this corner, and therefore they must have been made by someone who held the hatchet in the hand that was on the side of the east wall of the room.

"He must face the closet door, and to have faced it and used the other hand the blows of the hatchet would have been oblique, slanting toward this east wall, for he must have struck across the width of his body to reach the crack in the door. But the marks of the blade in the crack of this door are precisely straight into it. And, therefore, the robber struck with the hand that was on the side against the east wall. And, therefore, he struck with his left hand . . . and, therefore, he was left-handed!"

Colonel Braxton threw down the hatchet.

"AND now that we know the man," he said, "let us get the plate."

He crossed the room with long strides, passed through the broken doors and out onto the lawn.

The three persons followed him.

But when he stepped down from the brick terrace onto the sod, Mr. Ridgewood Carter stopped him. The features of his mask were tense, as though emotions strained it, and his voice when he spoke was like a thing held level by a pressure.

"You know where this plate is?"

"Yes."

"How did you discover that, sir?"

Colonel Braxton looked the man squarely in the face.

"By the simplest observation in the world," he said.

And he extended his hand toward the river. But at this moment an inexplicable thing took place: Mr. Ridgewood Carter vanished! The expression is almost accurately descriptive, for he sprang aside into the bushes and began to run south along the river to a distant forest, dodging in and out among the trees.

Mr. Orlandus Wood cried out:

"What is this?"

"This," replied Colonel Braxton, with a gesture toward the distant fugitive, "is the escape of the thief."

"The thief!" repeated the attorney.

"Precisely that," replied Colonel Braxton. "The thief."

He turned about toward the attorney and the girl. And when he went on in his explanation, his voice was low-pitched and leisurely.

"I will tell you how I know it: When I came to examine the physical evidences of this robbery, it was clear, as I have explained, that it was the work of a left-handed man. That, in fact, no other than a left-handed man could have accomplished it. That much was certain. But that was not enough. A thousand left-handed men could be assembled. The problem was to distinguish the one certain left-handed man who had done this thing. What left-handed man was it?

"NOW, to determine this it was necessary to examine all other evidence with care, and when Carter took us over this trackage of the robbery to the river I noticed every detail. Presently, a conspicuous thing appeared, that you will yourself at once see when I name it. Occasionally, where the earth was soft on the lawn, and all about the mud banks of the river, I observed that a number of the footprints were more deeply indented at the toe than at the heel. In fact, where the track was not deeply pressed in, as at the river, the toe only of the footprint was visible.

"This fact would seem, at a first glance, to confirm the theory that a number of persons had accomplished the robbery, for here was an inequality of tracks. But when I looked more closely, I observed that all the tracks were roughly of the same length and width. It became clear, then, that, even with this marked difference, the whole trackage had been made by one person. This peculiarity in certain of the tracks was due to some peculiarity in the foot of that person.

"Following this idea, I presently saw that all these peculiar prints were prints of a right foot. It was therefore evident that these tracks were all made by one man, and that this man had some peculiarity of the right foot; something that caused the toe of the right foot to be more deeply indented, in a print, than the heel.

"Now, a right leg that was a trifle shorter than the other would cause this, because, to equal the stride, such a person would step with the toe first, and the weight of the body when it came on the right leg would be borne by the toe. Consequently, it was clear that this robbery and all this evidence of trackage had been done by a left-handed man who had also a short right leg."

Colonel Braxton paused, and indicated the tracks made in the soft earth where Carter had sprung aside into the bushes.

"You will see," he said, "that deep print of the toe of the right foot."

The amazement of Mr. Orlandus Wood could not be concealed.

"But the man is Martha Carter's brother!"

"He is that," continued Colonel Braxton; "but he is also something more."

He went on:

"I could not recall him when I first arrived. But when he began to pace behind the sofa, stepping only on the toe of his right foot, and when he put out his left hand to receive the gold pieces, and when he signed your deed with his left hand, I knew where I had seen him. . . . It was in a court-room at New Orleans, where he was sentenced to the penitentiary for a looting by his boat crew. He had been shot in the leg and captured. He stood up on his crutch, and he raised his left hand when he was being sworn in his defense. He is the convict owner of the 'Eldorado'."

"But the plate," cried the attorney! "How can you know where it is hidden?"

"Now that," replied Colonel Braxton, "was a mere matter of deduction. When I knew that Carter was the thief and that he had acted alone, I was certain that the plate would be hidden somewhere about the premises. Because, as he had no accomplice, he would keep it near him until he could, himself, take it away. I was puzzled until I began to consider why Carter took the trouble to make the old boat appear to be the landing of the robbers. And when his explanation of the abrasions on the board at the rear of this boat was so obviously false, I knew where he had concealed the plate.

"That abrasion on the board by the chain, anchoring the rear of the boat into the river, was not the lateral abrasion that the swing and lurch of a river boat landing against it would necessarily make. It was a straight, vertical abrasion, clearly made by drawing up the chain. But the boat had not been loosed from its mooring to the river bank. It had not been used for any purpose. There could be only one reason for thus drawing up the chain—obviously to conceal the stolen plate by lowering it on this chain into the river."

And now that his eyes were opened, the attorney was even more amazed.

"Colonel, Colonel," he went on, "why these indirections? Why these involved maneuvers by the man? And why, in the name of all common sense, should he make this deed?"

"Because," replied Colonel Braxton, "he did not wish a further experience in the penitentiary. He did not intend to divide with an accomplice, and so manufactured all these evidences himself. And by this deed as you had written it, he got a title to the plate he stole. He was giving, as he knew, a doubtful value for it."

"A doubtful value for it?" repeated Mr. Orlandus Wood. "Do you call this house, these lands, of doubtful value?"

"Of doubtful value!" replied Colonel Braxton. "The title is defective. It is based on a tax deed and subject to redemption."

IT WAS further on that Mr. Orlandus Wood remembered another thing that had given him some concern:

The plate, tied up in a sack, and sunk in the river, fastened to the boat chain, had been recovered, and the priceless pieces emptied out onto the floor of the violated room. It was a great treasure, worth a fortune. The girl hovered over it, in silence, in wonder, as before some enchantment of the fairy.

But Mr. Orlandus Wood stood up with a grave, and somewhat troubled face.

"This guardian of Miss Carrington," he said. "We must make a careful report of this affair for him."

"He will know all about it," replied Colonel Braxton.

"But how could he know?" continued the lawyer. "He is not here."

"Not here!" replied Colonel Braxton in his leisurely drawl. "Do you practice before the juries of Virginia, and forget the Scriptures? . . .

"The Guardian of the Fatherless . . . not here!"

I'm for it a hundred per cent!

I'M ALL for P.A. Without a single mental reservation. It's my brand and I want the whole world to know. That's not sentiment—it's sanity. Swing back the hinged lid on a tidy red tin and let that glorious P.A. fragrance broadcast its own story. Then load up and light up. . . .

Cool as the box-office man. Welcome as two-on-the-aisle. Mild as milk-toast, yet with plenty of rich, satisfying body to let you know you're smoking. A pipe is a grand old pal when you pack it with P.A. And you want to pack and puff from morning to midnight, once you get a taste of this tobacco in your jimmy-pipe. You'll say so.

More Prince Albert is smoked than any other brand. Nobody can tell me that this just "happens." That many million men can't be wrong.

No matter what your present set-up may be, try long-burning P.A. If you don't check with me, then you're right and the world's wrong!

Every tin contains TWO full ounces of the grandest tobacco you ever smoked.

"Pink Tooth Brush"

—a protest from over-coddled gums

HAVE you ever noticed, as you brush your teeth, a tinge of pink upon the bristles of your brush? If you have, it is a sign that you should at once begin to look after the health of your gums.

Most cases of "pink tooth brush" and other troubles of the gums can be traced to our present-day habits of eating.

Our diet is soft and creamy, we eat too quickly. Our teeth and gums do not get enough rough, hard chewing that coarser fare would give. The circulation within the gum walls becomes sluggish and slow. The gingival tissues lose their tone, they grow soft and tender to the brush. They bleed—the first warning of more serious troubles to come.

How Ipana and massage repair the damage soft food does

But it is simple, as any dentist will inform you, to keep the gums in health in spite of modern food.

Massage is one great aid. Ipana Tooth Paste is another. A gentle frictionizing takes but a minute morning and night and helps to restore the normal circulation, to relieve congestion and to bring the gums back to a healthy state. And Ipana, because of its content of ziratol, aids the massage in toning the gums and in rendering them firm, sound and more resistant to disease and infection.

The ten-day trial tube will acquaint you with Ipana's delicious flavor and its unexcelled cleaning power. But the better plan is to get a full-size tube at the drug store. Use it faithfully for a whole month, and see how your gums respond to good care!

IPANA TOOTH PASTE

situated for our purpose; and so they have proved. A few years later, we established our third hospital, at St. Anthony, on the narrow peninsula of Newfoundland which sticks up northward toward Labrador. Gradually we added nursing stations, orphanages, schools, a seaman's institute, and other centers. And so the mission has gradually grown."

Nothing has ever impressed the Labrador fishermen so powerfully as this sudden, amazing arrival of a doctor in their midst. To the pious it seemed almost a divine visitation, something that could come to mortals only once in a lifetime. But next summer Doctor Grenfell was back with two additional physicians and two trained nurses. And never since has the Labrador lacked a doctor—though Labrador weather has frequently made it difficult to get a call through to the doctor and sometimes made it all but impossible for the doctor to get to his patient.

In his second winter on the coast, Doctor Grenfell had just returned from a two-weeks circuit of three hundred miles in which he had visited several villages in his komatick (Eskimo sled) when he was awakened in the night by men's voices and the sound of dogs on the crisp snow at the hospital door. They were from Stark's Cove, fifty miles to the north. Jennie Gardner had broken her arm, and, "Doctor, she needs you bad."

"The men had struggled all day through the heavy drifts," said Doctor Grenfell, "but it was all I could do to persuade them that a few hours' delay for rest would not prove fatal to a broken arm.

"WE WERE away at daybreak. Fresh snow was falling steadily and kept up all morning, making the going very difficult. Our lead dogs sank almost out of sight. We walked in front of them in our racquets to beat a path. Night found us in a dense spruce thicket, and there we spent the night in a wayside log tilt.

"All night the snow fell. At the first peep of dawn, we were up, shook the snow out of our clothes, and boiled the kettle. Two of the dogs were missing, and there was a provoking delay until they were excavated from an immense snowdrift, where they had slept cozily all night while the storm piled additional inches of blanket over them.

"At sundown of the second day we still had eighteen miles to go; but the country was level and the road beaten hard, so we decided to push on. Finally, only three miles remained, and we came to the forking of the trails. The left trail was ours, the right led to Safety Cove. We noticed that the Safety Cove trail was marked by the fresh tracks of many komaticks, and paused, wondering what could be the reason for so much traffic. Soon we caught sight of two men waving a flag and shouting to us, obviously an emergency call.

"So I called to my lead dog, 'All right, Charley. Ouk! Ouk! Ouk!' He swung to the right, and in a few minutes our whole cavalcade was pulling up the Safety Cove way and the messengers were running down to meet us. They directed us to the house of Jim Kempson, who 'had a bad knee.'

"It was a very bad knee. His leg was swollen to the size of his body, and the poor fellow lay half unconscious surrounded by a houseful of friends. The two down-stairs rooms were packed. Even the little up-stairs space under the roof—which was divided by a partition into two bedrooms, in one of which Jim lay—had its quota of sympathizers. To clear the house of this kindly gathering was a delicate undertaking but it was managed.

"Three of the neighbors stayed, at my request, to help. One was detailed to take down the partition between the bedrooms, plane the boards, and make a full-length bathtub. Another cut a window in the roof, for Jim needed fresh air. I asked the third helper to take every thing movable outside—room was needed for the work that was ahead.

"My hunting knife served for a lancet. I made seven incisions in Jim's leg—it was a case resembling erysipelas—and then he was placed in the newly made bath, which had been half filled with a warm antiseptic solution. The tub was a thoroughly shipshape job, its seams caulked with pitch. Blankets sealed Jim in his bath, only his head protruding. Faithful friends kept port and starboard watch all night."

As morning dawned, Doctor Grenfell journeyed to Jennie Gardner's and set her arm. It was now the fourth day since she had sent for him, and I suggested that she must have been rather nervous and fretful.

"Not a bit of it," answered Doctor Grenfell. "She actually said that she was proud she broke her arm, since it had brought me in time to save Jim Kempson's life."

But Jim was not out of danger. It was four days before the crisis passed and Jim emerged from his long drowsiness. Then the Doctor harnessed his dogs and was off on the trail back to the hospital.

PERHAPS the Doctor's closest call is an experience that began one Easter in St. Anthony. Doctor Grenfell was walking home from church at noon when runners arrived with an urgent summons from Englee, sixty miles south. A young fisherman there, who had been operated on for an acute bone disease, was threatened with blood poisoning.

Within two hours Doctor Grenfell was on the trail, with his well-packed komatick behind his best team of dogs. By dusk he had traveled twenty miles and reached the village of Lock's Cove, on the edge of Hare Bay. Here he spent the night in a fisherman's cottage, and started on the trail again early Monday morning.

"It was raining as we put out," recalled Doctor Grenfell, "and the snow was beginning to get slushy. I skirted the edge of the bay, which was thick with broken ice, and soon spied a natural bridge of ice which crossed the bay to an

Another Pipe Smoker Voices Tobacco Joy in Flowery Verse

When a man writes poetry it's a sure sign he's in love with someone—or something. Some men are inspired by beautiful womanhood, some by a gorgeous sunset. Here's a man inspired by his favorite smoking tobacco:

THE BLUE TIN CAN

I've tried the brands from every clime;
Choice mixtures with Perique;
But long—Oh, long ago! I learned
The only brand to seek.

Each day our useless worries mount,
Our evenings to provoke;
But through the alchemy of fire
They vanish into smoke.

They vanish when our spirit holds
No enmity toward man,
And smoke the sunshine bottled up
In Edgeworth's Blue Tin Can.

So smoke away! This loyal friend
Is void of bite or sting
For He is monarch of a world
Where Happiness is King.

Irving H. Walker,

island three miles out. If I could travel across this, instead of making the circuit around the bay, I would shorten my journey by several miles—and I decided to risk the ice.

"All was going well. I had reached the island, crossed it, and was only a quarter mile from the farther shore, when suddenly the wind fell off and I saw the ice loosen. Then its real character appeared: it was only 'sish' ice, fragments chipped off by the pounding of the big pans and topped by a thin crust of fresh ice. The wind blowing into the bay from the sea had forced this sish into a compact mass; but without the wind my 'bridge' was crumbling under my feet."

This process was hastened by a new turn of the wind—it now began to blow from off shore, and in a few minutes there were innumerable cracks as the ice was driven seaward. Doctor Grenfell cast off his oilskins to be free for swimming, got down on his hands and knees to distribute his weight on the thin crust, and urged his team ahead. But they had not gone twenty yards before the dogs wavered, and down sank doctor, komatick, and the dog team into the slushy ice.

"I QUICKLY reached forward with my sheath knife and cut the traces, being careful, however, to hold the leader's trace which I wound round my wrist," said Doctor Grenfell.

This lead dog, Brian, was floundering near a large slab, upon which he presently climbed. By hauling on the traces, Doctor Grenfell reached Brian's floating island, and helped the other seven dogs upon it. Then he saw that its sides were already crumbling, so he quickly selected another pan, some twenty yards distant, and by a strategy got the dogs to swim to it. Partly by swimming and partly by hauling on the long trace, the Doctor reached this second refuge. But it proved to be no more substantial than the other, and in a few minutes he chose a third ice-pan, and by the same process finally landed himself and his dogs on it.

"This ice-pan was an irregular-shaped slab about twelve feet wide and perhaps a foot thick," explained Doctor Grenfell. "It was really snow which had packed over the slob ice and frozen, and it seemed a poor raft for so large a load. But we could only stay with it now, for I was chilled from my three encounters with the icy water and, besides, we were rapidly drifting into heavier seas. At one time I thought we might drift ashore, but suddenly the pan hit a projecting rock. A large piece broke off, and we were swerved around and sent seaward.

"I could see my komatick still protruding above the broken ice, its food, vacuum bottle of hot tea, dry clothes, and everything, going to waste, while I shivered in my dripping clothes. I had left my oilskins at the komatick, discarded my khaki overalls on the first ice-pan, and lost my hat, coat, and gloves. I still had on a flannel shirt, sweater vest, a pair of running shorts (relic of my university athletics which I had chanced upon just recently), a pair of woolen stockings, and sealskin moccasins which reached to my hips. I now cut off the moccasins at the feet, split the legs and made a sort of cape which was some protection to my shoulders. A few minutes later, I saw my komatick disappear under the ice."

By afternoon Doctor Grenfell had gradually dried his clothes by taking off a piece at a time, wringing it, waving it in the wind. But the air was growing colder; he must have more clothes, and the only ones available were the fur coats on his dogs. Sorrowfully, he selected the dog that he could spare best, slipped a noose over his head and threw him. Then he stabbed him in the heart, and in a few minutes had removed the shaggy hide.

I asked him if that was not risky—killing and skinning a large animal on a flimsy cake of ice in near proximity to seven hungry dogs.

"Oh, I know how to kill a dog," he answered. "The most difficult part was bringing my mind to sacrifice a faithful friend. But we could not all live. As I killed him, I wondered if a quick death were not better than the slow torture that seemed ahead."

Before dark Doctor Grenfell had killed two more dogs in this way. He piled up the carcasses and sat behind this windbreak, ripping up the flannel binding of the leather traces and stuffing the ravelings into his shoes, knickers, and shirt as an additional protection against the biting cold. Then he made the largest dog, Doc, a ninety-two-pounder, lie down by him and, wrapping up in the three skins, cuddled close to Doc. With this warm bedfellow, his ice cradle rocked by the sea, Doctor Grenfell went fast asleep.

"I awoke shivering, with a frozen hand, to find the moon rising out of the open sea which was now just ahead of me. Out there, in the big swells, we could not last long, I knew. I prayed for a miracle. Suddenly the wind shifted, and was followed by a dead calm. The cold now was intense. More ice was forming every minute, which was uncomfortable but encouraging. I lay down beside Doc and dropped off to sleep again.

"Suddenly I awoke with the idea that I must do what I could to signal my friends in the morning. I must have a flagpole. I set to work in the moonlight to take apart the legs of my dead dogs. It was slow, and rather painful with the frostbitten hand, but before daybreak I had made a clumsy staff by binding the legs together with old harness rope. At dawn I stripped off my shirt, attached it to the staff, and began to wave it. Fishermen are early risers—daybreak is the usual time for starting on the komatick trail—and if there was any eye looking my way I didn't want it to mistake me for a slumbering seal or a bit of wreckage."

THIS was Tuesday morning. Doctor Grenfell had been a day and a night afloat. During that time he had not seen a sign of life on shore, not a curl of smoke nor the gleam of a bonfire, nor anything to suggest that his plight was known to his friends. "As I stood in my dog skins, waving my shirt at those bleak headlands, I laughed at the ludicrous figure I made." But he felt that it was now or never. The day was brilliant, cloudless. The sea glittered. At times the Doctor thought he saw men on the snowy cliffs, and he waved his gay shirt until his arms ached.

"At one time I saw a peculiar flash on the water. I watched it and decided it was only another deceptive reflection of sunlight. To think of a boat there was

If you've baked beans yourself, you know that it takes real baking to get that real "baked bean" flavor.

We bake our beans just as you would bake them—in the dry heat of ovens . . . It's the only way we know to have them mealy, tender and golden brown in color, with that real nut-like taste without which "baked beans" are not baked beans.

Then developing our own seed for tomatoes for the sauce makes a difference. The tomatoes must be plump and juicy and ripe, you know, and uniform in flavor and used fresh.

Then there is one more important ingredient in every Heinz product—the fifty-nine years of experience Heinz has had in making good things to eat. For it is this ingredient that has made the Heinz name mean Flavor.

H. J. HEINZ COMPANY, PITTSBURGH, PA.

That golden baked-brown look of Heinz Baked Beans! That warm, tempting aroma! Every blessed bean ready to burst with the old-time baking it's been having. Over them all—and through and through every one—luscious tomato sauce...Welcome always this steaming plate of just-out-of-the-oven flavor.

unreasonable, for among those heavy pans a boat might be crushed like an eggshell under a cartwheel.

"But when I came back to my flag-waving a few minutes later, I saw the same glitter again, more distinct, and it was regular, like the dip of oars. As I watched, gradually there appeared a darker shadow which seemed to be the hull of a boat."

Twenty minutes later, the boat was alongside, and the man in the bow stepped onto the icepan. "Not a word was spoken," said Doctor Grenfell. "Tears streamed down his cheeks as he grasped both my hands. It was the same with the other four rescuers. Hearts were too full for words. I swallowed some hot tea and a bit of bread. Then we loaded the five dogs into the boat. As we struggled back, the men rowing laboriously through the slob, at times hauling the boat upon the larger pans and dragging her over, I had a picture of what they had risked, and of the meaning and sacredness of friendship."

These five men had been trying all night to get to Doctor Grenfell. Just before dark Monday, a fisherman caught sight of something strange on the ice, and had run to the only man in the village who had a spyglass. They hurried to the cliffs and saw that the strange object was a man. By a process of reasoning they figured that it must be the Doctor. Finding it impossible to launch a boat at night, they sent messengers along the coast and stationed lookouts on the cliffs. Fortunately for the peace of mind of the hospital staff, the messengers did not reach St. Anthony until Tuesday morning. Miss Jessie Luther, of Providence, Rhode Island, who was a volunteer at the hospital, has told me of the awful pall that fell upon the place when it was known what had happened.

That narrow scrape with death threw into bold relief the generous, ungrudging, cheerful nature of the service the Doctor had been giving so freely all the years. Everybody up and down the Labrador and all over Newfoundland was talking about the Doctor, about his hospitals where miracles are done, and about the kindly nurses and physicians and teachers he had brought up to the coast. It was a costly reminder; but it knit the people even more closely to their Labrador Doctor.

BESIDE the hospital in St. Anthony, there is an orphanage.

"That just happened, and then grew gradually," explained Doctor Grenfell. "Those who attended the World's Fair in Chicago may remember the Eskimo Village, and, if so, they will recall Prince Pomiuk, the little Eskimo boy whose dexterity with the thirty-foot lash of his dog whip made him one of the attractions of the Fair. Well, one day, on a cruise up a far northern fjord, I found a boy lying on the rocks outside a hut, naked, hungry, helpless with a diseased hip. He was Prince Pomiuk. The Eskimos were willing to be rid of the crippled boy, who was 'no good for the fishin',' so I took him in our ship. He spent the few remaining years of his life with me—our first orphan.

"A little later, I was called to visit a sick family which lived on a lonely headland fifty miles north. I was surprised when we anchored, to receive no signs of welcome. We landed and hurried to the little cottage. The mother lay dead on the bed, the father was on the floor dying, and five frightened children hid themselves in odd corners of the house. Next day, we made coffins, dug a grave, conducted the funeral service—and found ourselves with five children. An uncle agreed to adopt one, two we placed with a devoted couple in Massachusetts, and with the remaining two we started our Children's Home, in St. Anthony. Later, we established a second orphanage farther up the Labrador, at Sandwich Bay."

It is hard to think of a Labrador problem to which Doctor Grenfell has not lent a helping hand. Education, for example: Schools were few and feeble, and when the Doctor took on the orphans he discovered that his responsibility also included their schooling. Gradually this boon of education was extended to village children, and schools multiplied. Now there is a string of them along the coast. The more promising graduates are sent to the United States to complete their education. It is a matter of pride to the Doctor that out of ninety-two Grenfell students who have thus gone to the States, eighty have returned to the coast to devote their trained minds and skilled hands to Labrador problems.

Doctor Grenfell has helped his people organize their own coöperative stores, so that they may buy and sell for cash, instead of being hopelessly in debt all the time to traders, who advance provisions against the season's catch of fish. The Doctor has also been active in fostering other enterprises—a coöperative sawmill, a fox farm, rug-weaving and other industries, and in importing a herd of reindeer from Lapland.

AMONG the many functions that are united in Doctor Grenfell, the missionary, are those of magistrate, coast surveyor, commissioner of wrecks, and preacher, not to mention that of skipper, for he is a licensed navigator, master of his hospital ship.

There have been several hospital ships. "The Albert" was succeeded by the "Sir Donald," gift of Sir Donald Smith, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway. This, in turn, gave way to the "Strathcona," the gift of Lord Strathcona. It was wrecked five years ago, but was promptly replaced by a new and more modern "Strathcona II," which is Doctor Grenfell's present hospital ship. In addition, there are several auxiliary vessels, launches, and a schooner.

"The picture of the Doctor that is most characteristic," said one of his long-time workers, "is the sight of him at the wheel of the 'Strathcona,' edging up to the landing of some remote village. All the men are down to greet him, perhaps there is some jovial reference to 'How you nosed her in, Doctor!' and then he lands. Everybody wants to grip his hand, some have 'a hurt' to show, perhaps one exhibits proudly a healed arm that the Doctor treated on his last visit. Meanwhile, the women have been gathering at one of the cottages. It is the event of the summer—the Doctor's visit! Some of them just sit, rather inarticulate, but the Doctor has a word and a handclasp for each, and then he leads the simple prayer in building literally millions of dozens of fine golf-balls, could have produced the Maxpar.

The Maxpar combines under one cover all the qualities of the best golf balls. Slanting mesh that means easier cleaning . . . lasting durability . . greater length of flight . . . extreme accuracy in putting . . . ability to stand punishment without becoming "egg-shaped."

You can play the new Maxpar hole after hole without changing. And since scientific research has proved that the resiliency of any golf ball increases with play, you get out of the Maxpar every yard of the long distance built into it.

With the Maxpar on the tee, the combination of every advantage that can be gained in a ball is yours.

service and perhaps makes a brief address. If he were the Archbishop of Canterbury the people couldn't be prouder of a visit. He visits the sick, and any who need hospital care are taken on board the 'Strathcona.' Almost every village has its Uncle Malcolm or Aunt Jane or other aged person—the Doctor never fails to visit them and have a cup of tea. When the rounds have been made, he is off—the next village may be a day's journey—and your last glimpse is of him at the wheel, the sure-eyed skipper, proud of his vessel, piloting her through the narrow channel."

"The hardest work I have," Doctor Grenfell said to me, "is lecturing." Much of his time each winter now must be spent visiting the cities and towns of the United States, Canada, Newfoundland, and Great Britain, telling of his work.

It was while returning to New York from a lecture tour in England in the spring of 1909 that Doctor Grenfell met on shipboard Miss Ann McClanahan, of Chicago. He proposed marriage before the ship docked. The young lady protested, "But you don't even know my name," whereupon, it is said, the Doctor replied, "That doesn't matter; I know what it's going to be."

They were married in Chicago in November, and Mrs. Grenfell had the exciting experience of arriving at her new home in a Labrador blizzard, which frosted the ship like a huge Christmas cake. She took to the northern life as naturally and enthusiastically as did the Doctor, accompanied him on his trips—traveling countless miles both on the komatick trail and aboard the "Strathcona." Even a growing family of three children and the care of "the Doctor's House" on the hill at St. Anthony, do not divert her major time from the Doctor's work; and among the great company of volunteers who have helped to make the mission, she takes first place.

THESE volunteers are an amazing tribute to the Doctor's personality.

Many of them are highly-trained professional men. One of the leading eye specialists in the United States travels every summer from San Francisco to Labrador to give his service to the Doctor's people. "That one man," said Doctor Grenfell, "has made more of our blind to see than are listed in all the miracles of the four Gospels."

Last summer, when the new hospital at St. Anthony was dedicated in the presence of a notable assemblage of guests from many lands, the Governor of Newfoundland tapped the Labrador Doctor on the shoulder with his sword, in the name of King George, and made him a Knight Commander of St. Michael and St. George.

So now it is Sir Wilfred and Lady Grenfell. The people are proud of the new honor that has come to their long-time friend; but they keep on calling him "the Doctor."

"As you look back upon the years in Labrador, what looms up as its greatest compensation?" I asked Sir Wilfred.

"The life itself has been its best reward," he answered quickly. "I have always thought that the Good Samaritan went across the road to the wounded man just because he wanted to. I went to Labrador for the same reason—and I have enjoyed the life there hugely.

"Anyone who went there with a feeling of complacency at his own self-sacrificing goodness, would soon have it shamed out of him. One winter night, after traveling all day through the snow, I knocked at a cottage to ask for a night's rest. The man and his wife were out of bed instantly; he got out his lantern and insisted on feeding my dogs while his wife was heating cocoa for me. Later, I learned that the milk and sugar which went into it were a precious hoard, saved for guests. Nor did I know, until long afterward, that the bed they sent me to was the one they had just quitted, and that they spent the remainder of the night on the floor of their kitchen.

"On another occasion, when I awoke in the morning, I found that my host had risen earlier and had taken the road to the next village, fourteen miles away. I was bound for that village, and he had walked ahead to break a trail through the snow for me; and, also, to carry some milk and sugar to 'save the face' of the poor family who were to entertain me that night.

"MONEY could not compensate for such kindness and hospitality—nor would it be accepted. 'It's th' way of the coast.'

"One morning I landed at Deep Water Creek to see an old Englishman known as Uncle Solomon. I was directed to the home of Skipper John, who greeted me cordially at his cottage door. Inside, a young man was playing on the floor with three children. I supposed they were Skipper John's grandchildren; but no. He explained that their mother had recently died, and he had temporarily taken the orphans into his own home.

"My patient was up-stairs, in the triangular space under the roof. On one corner, screened off with cheesecloth, was Uncle Solomon, indistinguishable under a pile of bedclothes, while near by his blind wife sat on a low bench droning a hymn tune. 'Uncle Solomon, it's the Doctor,' I said. He put forth a trembling hand. 'No pain, Uncle Solomon, I hope?' Grasping my hand he answered, 'No pain, Doctor, thank the Lord and Skipper John. The Skipper took us in when the old lady and I were starving.' But the old woman put in, 'He suffers a lot, Doctor, but he won't own it.'

"As I came down the ladder, Skipper John met me with the most solicitous thanks for my coming. 'But thanks aren't dollars, Doctor. What little we'd put by has gone to help the old people, and I've got not a penny now. But if I gets a fox skin this winter, I'll pay you for your visit anyhow.'

"'Skipper John,' I asked, 'what relation are those old people to you?' He answered, 'Well, no relation 'zactly.'

"'Don't they pay you anything at all?' He shook his head. 'Them has nothing, and was homeless and the old lady already blind.'

"'How long have they been with you?'

"He was silent, counting up. 'Just twelve months come Saturday.'"

Three orphans down-stairs and the aged couple up-stairs!

"Why do you do it?" Doctor Grenfell asked. The old man looked intently at the Doctor.

"What, what would you do?" he said, in reply.

It's pure whole wheat. Firm, meaty grains, cooked, drawn out to a ribbon so filmy-thin, so fine-spun, there's three whole yards of it, wound round and round, to every Muffet! Baked. Toasted crunchier than toast itself! Crumbles in the mouth like oven-crisped crackers.

All whole wheat's health properties, too—vitamins, calories, minerals, roughage (bran). Easy digestibility. And, best of all, corking good to eat!

Serve Muffets at breakfast tomorrow morning, with cream and sugar. Or add fruit, fresh-sliced, stewed or preserved.

Enjoy one yourself, and get an extra treat out of watching the rest of the family enjoy them!

"I Need My Job as Station Agent!"

a month, it enabled me, in 1891, to marry the girl back in Shenandoah, set up a home, and keep on saving something.

"But I wasn't satisfied. I wanted to earn still more. So I tried to figure out some way of increasing my express commissions. I knew that raw silk shipments went by express. As they were very valuable, the charges—and consequently the commissions—were high.

"I wanted these commissions! So I got the judge of the county, our congressman, and a few personal friends to start a silk mill in the outskirts of Shamokin.

"Later on, a young man, C. K. Eagle, came to learn the business. Eventually he and his brother took over the mill. Today it is a ten-million-dollar corporation with three extensive plants in Shamokin and many in other parts of the state.

"What was the result for me? Bigger commissions; not only from silk, but from general shipments as well. Because the silk industry made the town grow, and that made the express business grow.

"Here's something I want to tell you in that connection: The express company recognize the fact that I built up the business; and they think it only fair that I should continue to share the rewards. So you needn't talk to me about 'soulless corporations.'

"Well, as you can see, I was getting along pretty good for a young man with just an ordinary job. I probably would be promoted. In fact, at one time it looked as if I was going to be transferred to Reading; so I bought a house and lot there, using the money that had been accumulating since my father started to save it for me.

"The transfer wasn't made, but I kept the property and rented it. Then a new addition to Shamokin was opened up. It was called Edgewood; and it was so pretty out there and such a nice place for our two little children, John and Margaret, that I decided to build a home there.

"MOST of my savings had gone into the Reading property. But my mother-in-law, who was as good to me as my own mother, offered to help me; and in this way I was able to pay something down. I gave mortgages on the Shamokin property, and on what I owned in Reading; and so was able to borrow the rest.

"You have to know all this in order to understand what I did later. In due course of time I paid off the mortgages. It took all I could save for a number of years. But when it was done I owned a pretty nice home—we still live in it—and I had established myself as a man who could be trusted to meet his obligations.

"I was so relieved to get out of debt that I would have been glad, I guess, to keep out of it for a while. It was my boy, John, that got me into it again.

"One day, about eighteen years ago, we were all eating our lunch at home, when John said to me: 'Did you know the sheriff is going to sell the Majestic Theatre?'

"'That's good news!' I said.

"You see, my kids were crazy about the movies, and my wife and I weren't far behind them! The Majestic Theatre, in spite of its grand name, was only a little five-cent house. But we lived so far out that every time we went to a show I had to pay car fare, both ways, for the whole family, which made it pretty expensive. So I figured that closing the theatre would certainly help my purse. But John, who was fifteen then, had a different notion.

"'I wish you'd buy it for me!' he said.

"'What would you do with a movie theatre?' I demanded.

"'I could run it,' he said. 'Tom Heaton and I could do it together.'

"Tom was his buddy; and of course I laughed at the idea of two kids running a theatre. But before I left for the office my mother-in-law got me off into a corner and added her persuasions.

"I laughed at her too. But as I rode down-town on the street car, I couldn't get the thing out of my mind. I remembered how, when I was a boy, I had begged my father to buy a certain piece of property. He laughed at me! But afterward, when the property was sold for three times what it would have cost us, he couldn't forgive himself.

"FINALLY, I made up my mind that I wasn't going to turn down the first request of the kind that my own son had ever made. If I should lose the money, all right! Out of that experience John would at least learn something that would be of value to him.

"That afternoon I 'phoned the sheriff and asked him how much he had against the Majestic. He said it was nine hundred and fifty dollars on the building and equipment. The site was leased ground. When I told him I would buy it, he thought I was crazy. If a regular theatre man couldn't make it pay, how could I expect to do it?

"That was just what I had said to John; and he had given me the answer. The man who had owned it, he said, had gambled and drunk the profits.

"To pay the nine hundred and fifty dollars just about cleaned out every cent I had been able to save after paying for my house. But I gave the sheriff a check for it, and took possession of the theatre.

"It was a little frame building, seating only two hundred and ninety people. I didn't know a thing about the business, so I hired the man who had been running it for the previous owner—and I started in to learn the job myself. But I did it at night, without taking an hour from my regular duties!

"We cleared forty-five dollars the first week. When we came to the fourth Saturday night, we had ninety-five dollars profit for that week and everything looked fine. But after the performance that night, one of the state inspectors came to me and told me I'd have to close the theatre, because it did not comply with the requirements of the law.

"In my ignorance of the business I hadn't known anything about these legal requirements. When the inspector explained them to me, I realized that I Exquisite music beneath starlit heavens...

NESTLING among the mountains encircling Los Angeles is Hollywood Bowl, a natural amphitheatre dedicated to "Symphonies under the Stars." Here, during the rainless, invigorating summer nights, the world's greatest musicians and directors entertain.

The scene is enchanting, almost unbelievable. You are in the midst of thousands of enthusiasts, thrilling to the music in the refreshing coolness of a Southern California night; in front, the vast illuminated stage; above you, the starry skies alone! It is all so extraordinary, you seem transported to another realm.

Hollywood Bowl is but an incident of your vacation visit to Southern California next summer. Waiting for you, are 271 miles of Riviera-rivalling beaches with the keenest surf sports. Only an hour away are mile-high mountains to climb by trail, motor or trolley! And the orange orchards, Old Spanish Missions, canyons, palm-lined boulevards, mountain lakes and camps—what a country for really refreshing play or rest!

Los Angeles' growth and activity is astounding. Los Angeles County is immensely rich in natural resources, its oil fields alone being valued at a billion dollars. Last year its agricultural products approximated $95,000,000.

Five thousand miles of paved boulevards radiating from Los Angeles lead to every interest spot—to the highest mountains in the nation, to many of the great national parks, the ever-thrilling desert. You need never have an uninteresting moment in all your stay!

Start planning now to be here next summer. Los Angeles is the new gateway to Hawaii and the Orient, and the gateway to the whole Pacific Coast. Consult your nearest railroad ticket agent. Special low rate round trip tickets May 15 until Oct. 31.

couldn't fulfill them, even by remodeling the building. I'd have to close up for good.

"My wife and the children were in the lobby, waiting for me; and when I told them the news they all broke down and cried.

"'Don't give up!' I said to them; 'I ain't through yet!'

"That very night I got hold of the man who owned the ground on which the Majestic stood. Woke him out of his sleep and got a lease on the adjoining lot!

The next day I saw the lumber company and the contractors. Then I arranged to borrow the money I would need. On Monday morning, work was started. And three weeks from the night that the old theatre was closed, I opened the new one.

"Compared with the ones I have put up since then, it wasn't much to boast of: a modest frame building, seating fewer than six hundred. But at that time it was the finest theatre in this section. That's one thing I've done. I have always given the people something better than they have had before.

"The second Majestic made money from the very beginning. But instead of thinking that I had just that much more to spend, I let the profits go toward paying for the theatre.

"It sounds simple; and, in a way, it was simple. But that doesn't mean that it was easy! I was absolutely faithful to my other duties. The theatre paid me much more than my job as station agent. But if I had been compelled to give up one of them, I'd have stuck to the railroad, and that's the truth.

"During the day, I worked—and I worked hard—at the station. And at night, often until long past midnight, I was at the theatre. John was too young then to be of much assistance. About all he could do was to help usher.

"Anyway, I wanted to send him to college. He did go to Villanova, but during his second year he had appendicitis; and when he got over that, he didn't want to go back. I felt I hadn't the right to force him to go against his will, so I let him start to learn the theatre business.

"I may be wrong," he went on, after a pause; "but, do you know, I often think it was a happy chance that my boy had that attack of appendicitis! I've had a good many men working for me in my various enterprises, and usually I have found that those who have made good are the ones who were trained to work when they were boys.

"A MAN asked me a few years ago how I was getting along.

"'Well,' I told him, 'I'm only about a yard ahead of the sheriff—but I manage to keep ahead of him!'

"'You don't need to worry,' he said. 'Think of the asset you have in your boy, John.'

"That struck me as a wonderful way of putting it. He's a good son. And he's a fine business man. Don't take my word for it. I'm his father! But you can ask anybody that knows him. We have four theatres and a hotel now, and John is general manager of them all.

"Before I had finished paying for the second Majestic, I built a theatre in Pottsville. That's the way I've always done. I've used one property to finance another.

"You see how it has all grown out of the savings account my father started for me when I was a boy. That enabled me to buy the house and lot in Reading; and that investment helped me to borrow the money to build my home in Shamokin. With these properties as security, I could get the loan for putting up the Majestic. I was building up credit all this time.

"I certainly needed it; for the Majestic Theatre at Pottsville cost over sixty thousand dollars—and every cent of it was borrowed money! But it was the finest movie house in Schuylkill County; and the people of that district were so appreciative that it simply could not help make money.

"I had been the leader in erecting good theatres in this community. But a leader is sure to have followers; and competition, here in Shamokin, was becoming pretty keen.

"FINALLY I went to the cashier of my bank, a rich man himself, and said to him: 'I'm either going to get into the movie business right, or I'm going to get out altogether!'

"When I had explained the situation to him, he asked me why I didn't buy a certain lot and put up a new theatre.

"'But, good heavens, man!' I said. 'They're asking $35,000 for the lot alone!'

"'Well, what of it?' he demanded.

"'A good deal,' I said, 'when I haven't got much more than thirty-five dollars!'

"'Oh,' he laughed, 'you go and get the lot. Then come to me.'

"Inside of twenty-four hours I had an option on the property for $27,000 and had given my check for $900 to bind the bargain. That check took practically every dollar I had in the bank, for I had just finished paying for the Pottsville theatre.

"Then I went to the cashier and said: 'Well, you've got me into a pretty mess! I've bought a twenty-seven-thousand-dollar lot which I haven't the money to pay for. And, even if I had it, where will I get the money to build a theatre?'

"'That's all right,' he said. 'Start building; and come to us for money as you need it.'

"So I began the new Majestic, borrowing the money from the bank as the work progressed. Finally, when I owed them $95,000, the bank inspector called a halt. That was $15,000 more than the law allowed the bank to loan to one person.

"'But we will be personally responsible for the excess,' the bank officers said to the inspector.

"'Have you put that in writing?' he asked.

"'No,' they said; 'but we will.'

"I didn't want them to do this. I told them I'd get the money from another bank. But they said they knew it was a safe loan; and that if I had to pay interest on money they wanted me to pay it to their bank. They insisted on my taking $15,000 more—which made me $110,000 in debt! To-day I am a director in that same bank.

"A man can accomplish almost anything, if he has friends and credit. I have been fortunate in making wonderful friends; and I have been careful to prove that my credit was beyond question.

"Thirteen or fourteen years after I built the Pottsville theatre I undertook another enterprise. Tamaqua was my old home and I loved it. So I determined to give it the finest theatre and hotel in this part of the state, involving an outlay of $750,000! Which was some plan—for a man whose money was all tied up in other things.

"At first, I thought I'd form a company to finance it. But I didn't like going around and asking folks to buy stock; so I tore up the few subscriptions I had received and said I'd build it alone—or not at all.

"I borrowed $50,000 by mortgaging all my other property. It was far more security than I needed to give, but I wanted to be sure that no one would lose a dollar. Then I put out a $500,000 bond issue—which a few of my friends took. I have paid off most of the loans, and am gradually redeeming the bonds.

"The first thing I know," he laughed, "I'll be out of debt—unless I borrow another half million for something else. John's off to-day looking after something pretty big that we have under way, so there's no telling how much I'll owe before we're through."

"And yet," I said to him, "you keep your job as station agent!"

"You bet I do!" he exclaimed. "You see, that's the one I love! Not only because I made it what it is, but because it keeps me in contact with the best friends I have in the world. I know all the railway officials. Many of them, including the president, I knew when we were scarcely more than boys, working for the Reading even then.

"Every autumn I give them a party at the Valley Gun and Country Club, of which I am a member. I'll show it to you before we get to the Shamokin Valley Country Club, which is farther out. I was vice president of that when we started the new clubhouse; but it was too much work for a busy man who isn't as young as he used to be.

"The railroad officials come in their private cars to my party, and we have a couple of days together that I wouldn't miss for anything. The Reading organization is like a big family. I've been in that family for almost fifty years. Is it strange that I love it?

"I SUPPOSE you wonder why I am still only a station agent. Well, I've been offered dozens of promotions. If I hadn't made money outside, I'd have taken these chances and tried to go as far as I could with the railroad. But with my growing business interests, I wanted to stay in Shamokin. Not simply because of business but because it was home! My friends are here. Margaret and John are married and live here. And I have seven grandsons, who are the finest little fellows you ever saw.

"The greatest happiness money has brought me is this: I can afford to keep on being the station agent at Shamokin. In other words, I can afford to keep the job I love, live in the town I love, and be close to the family and the friends I love. So far as I am concerned, I don't want anything better than that.

As we drove along, Mr. Higgins pointed out the country home of one of his acquaintances, calling my attention to its beautiful location.

"Why don't you build a country home?" I asked.

"I did talk of it," he replied; "but my wife wouldn't let me!

"'What do we want of any more houses?' she said. 'We have a comfortable one here in Shamokin. There's our suite in the hotel at Tamaqua, always ready for us if we want to go there for a visit. And you have the country clubs whenever we feel like driving out of town. A house we don't need would be just a burden."

"You saw our home in town," he went on. "It's comfortable enough for anybody, but there's no show about it. We have that great big lot; but maybe you noticed that it isn't very well kept. That's because my grandchildren, who live across the street, use it as a playground for themselves and all their friends.

"Sometimes it seems as if seven kids can have about seven hundred playmates. But I don't care how many they have! I'd rather raise healthy children than grow roses, or fancy flowers of any kind. So, instead of a garden to show off, we have bare spots where the boys play baseball and football.

"ALL I want is to have them grow up to be as fine as my own children. John, when he began to earn money, always did just as I used to with my father—he brought it to me. After he came into business with me, he not only accounted for every penny that passed through his hands, but he wouldn't let me be as generous with him as I was willing to be. It's hard to spoil a boy like that.

"I guess he's like me in one respect: He loves the job for its own sake; not for what he gets out of it. My wife thinks I'm sort of queer because I always want to get down to the station. Sundays, for instance, when church is over, I tell Elwood"—the chauffeur—"to leave me at the station before he takes Mrs. Higgins home.

"I just like to sit there for an hour or so, looking over papers, and poking around a bit. I don't really work at times like that. It's more like resting; the way you rest when you sit down in an easy chair that just fits you, and talk with an old friend that you've known and loved all your life.

"A good many folks seem to lose their heads over money. They use it to get a lot of things which ain't what they want at all. But I don't intend to be cheated out of happiness just because I've made money. I get a lot of pleasure out of it. I like to give to the church; and I don't stop at giving only to my own church. I love to do things for my family. And there are other ways which, as I said before, I don't advertise. I like having a good car, too; and I enjoy belonging to the clubs and other organizations. My wife and I take a little trip occasionally; and we like that—but not so well as we like the getting home again!

"You see how it is. As I told you before, I don't act like a rich man. I guess," he laughed, "I act a good deal more like a station agent. And that's because everything that I care most about came to me when I was nothing but a station agent."

When You Feel Yourself Coming Down With a Cold

oily compound to drop into the nose in the early stages of a cold is the following:

Oil of eucalyptus	20 drops
Menthol	10 grains
Liquid paraffin	2 ounces

In all forms of colds, particularly these annual colds, the diet should be what doctors call "basic" in character; that is, foods should be eaten which tend to increase the alkali reserve of the blood stream. This means that more fruit, vegetables, and dairy products must be eaten; less meat, eggs, and cereals. Potatoes should take the place of bread at such times.

NOW, what shall we do for the sore throat or the tonsillitis that sometimes accompanies these colds? Aside from any good that gargling may do, I think the best way to treat a sore throat is by means of the so-called "heating compress."

Take a piece of linen cloth, one or two thicknesses—or cheesecloth, four or five thicknesses—between three and four inches wide and about twelve inches long. This is wet in ice water or cold water and is wrapped snugly about the neck. It should be wrung so dry that there will be no danger of dripping.

Over this piece of wet cloth, wrap a piece of mackintosh or oiled silk, making sure that the wet cloth underneath is fully covered. In an emergency, one can use newspapers, table oilcloth, paraffin paper, or any other waterproof material.

The third layer should consist of one or two thicknesses of flannel about four inches wide, wrapped snugly about the neck, so as to prevent evaporation of any of the moisture from the wet cloth next to the skin. This throat compress should be worn all night, and the linen cloth next to the skin should be slightly moist when the compress is removed in the morning.

This compress constitutes the best-known local and external treatment for incipient sore throat, colds, pharyngitis, tonsillitis, together with hoarseness and tickling of the throat. When the compress is taken off in the morning, the throat and the back of the neck should be thoroughly rubbed, either with ice or ice water and a rough towel for two or three minutes, and then carefully dried. It is very important that you do not forget this application of cold when the compress is removed in the morning, as it is absolutely necessary to prevent chilling of the throat during the day.

Some doctors think that the ordinary stock "cold vaccines," if given in large amounts at the onset of a cold, are beneficial, and I have seen some apparently good results from this procedure. I don't know whether the vaccines are specific or whether the benefit comes from stirring up the body in a reaction against a foreign protein. It may be that we shall find some day that any foreign protein injected at such a time is beneficial. But one thing must be remembered—it has to be given at the very onset of a cold in order to have any effect on these attacks.

Three. Treatment of recurrent colds, the catarrhal type: They are the colds which come and go many times during the year as the result of chronic sinus infections, and other abnormal conditions of the nose and throat. All the methods I have already suggested for the prevention of colds and for their treatment are valuable in these cases, but they are only palliative. The important thing to do for this group of colds is to consult a nose and throat specialist, find out the real cause of the trouble, and have it corrected. There may be more than one condition at the bottom of such recurrent colds. Sinuses may be infected; tonsils may be diseased; adenoids may be present. The drainage of the nose may be interfered with by a crooked septum or by enlarged turbinates.

Just as certainly as we have three groups of colds that are contagious, we have three that are non-contagious. They are confined almost entirely to susceptible individuals. That these colds are not contagious is proved not only by observation, but by repeated experiments in which the secretions of the noses of acutely afflicted individuals have been transplanted to those of non-afflicted persons without producing any symptoms of a cold.

While attention to general hygiene and all efforts to upbuild the health and increase the vital resistance are of some va'ue in this group of colds, the thing of great importance is to remove the specific causes which underlie it.

FOUR: Treatment of the deficiency colds: The colds resulting from calcium deficiency or diminished alkali reserve in the blood—the acidosis colds.

In recent years we have come to recognize a peculiar type of cold which may appear in the summer or winter, and which, in some respects, resembles an attack of hay fever in that the chief manifestation is a copious water discharge from the nasal mucous membrane. This discharge is sometimes almost like scalding water running out of the nose. An examination of the blood in many of these cases shows a deficiency of calcium. Now, it is not always an easy matter to get the blood to take and hold it, and while the doctor will probably prescribe certain definite amounts of calcium to be taken each day, at the same time it will be a good plan for such patients to make regular use of the calciumiodized table salts which are on the market at the present time. When we are successful in restoring to normal the calcium content of the blood, these cases show remarkable improvement, and finally are cured.

In the case of "alkali deficiency colds"—those frequent and varied attacks which go under the name of colds and which are caused by an overamount of acid in the blood (acidosis)—we are confronted with the simple proposition of quickly restoring the alkaline balance of the blood. In the case of colds of this type, a testing of a fresh specimen of urine, which ordinarily runs about 30° of acidity, in laboratory terminology, will show that the kidney secretion is running an acidity of 50° to 60°, or even higher.

The way quickly to counteract this acidity is to take a rounded teaspoonful of baking soda, stirred up in two thirds of a glass of orangeade or lemonade, and repeat every thirty minutes until three or four doses have been taken. Of course the scientific way to do this would be, after first testing the kidney secretion, to repeat these tests at frequent intervals and regulate the soda medication in accordance with the reduction in urinary acidity. It is almost equally undesirable to over-alkalinize the blood; but in the majority of these cases the giving of three or four doses, as suggested, will be quite safe.

The real and permanent treatment of this sort of cold is to prevent this condition of acidosis by means of proper diet. It should be borne in mind that all foods, except the fats and sugars, which are completely burned up in the body, leave behind an "acid" or "alkaline" ash, and this type of cold is to be prevented by making sure that your diet leans slightly toward the alkaline side of the column. The following parallel arrangement will show where most of our foods belong.

Acid Ash Foods

1. Animal foods: All forms of flesh foods, fish, fowl, etc., including all kinds of meat broths' soups, beef tea, bouillon, etc.
2. Eggs.
3. Breadstuffs: All kinds of breads, whether made of wheat, rye, or corn, crackers, toasts, griddle cakes, etc.
4. Pastries: All sorts of pies and cakes—except fruit pies and other desserts containing milk or sour fruits.
5. Cereals: Rice, oatmeal, and breakfast foods of all kinds, including the flaked and toasted breakfast foods.
6. Peanuts, plums, prunes and cranberries (plums and cranberries fall into this column because of their benzoic acid, which the body cannot oxidize).

Alkaline Ash Foods

1. Dairy products: Milk, ice cream, cottage cheese, cheese, buttermilk, etc.
2. Potatoes and bananas.
3. Soups: All forms of vegetable and fruit soups and broths.
4. Fruit juices: All the fresh fruit juices (except plums).
5. Fresh fruits: All fresh fruit, sweet and sour, except plums and cranberries.
6. Vegetables: All kinds, especially beets, carrots, celery, lettuce.
7. Dried fruits: Figs, raisins, dates, currants—all except prunes.
8. The legumes: Beans, peas, and lentils.
9. The nuts: All nuts belong in this column—including almonds.

I have seen many cases of frequently recurring colds, where nose and throat conditions are perfect, cured by eating more largely of the alkaline ash foods.

FIVE: Treatment of irritation colds: Colds resulting from dust, diminution of nasal secretions, and lack of humidity.

Here again we meet with another group of non-contagious colds. A cold is often brought on by some extraordinary housecleaning on the part of the housewife. Workingmen have colds caused by dusty workrooms. I have known many a cold to be started up by sweeping out a garage or by trying to clean up the basement. Of course there may be a chronic diseased condition of the nose and throat, and this dust proves to be the agent that precipitates the fresh outbreak of the smoldering chronic infection.

In the case of many individuals over forty years of age, the mucous membrane of the nose seems to have largely lost its power of providing the germicidal secretions which were abundant in earlier years. This dry condition of the nose seems to predispose to that irritation which is capable of setting up the violent reaction we call a cold. This type of cold can largely be prevented by anointing the nostrils with a little simple ointment, such as borated vaseline. There are many of these ointments on the market which are not irritating to the nose, and which prevent that undue drying out and the formation of crusts during sleep. I don't think it is a good thing to start this practice early in life unless absolutely necessary, for when started it will probably have always to be kept up. A simple ointment for this purpose is the following:

Menthol	.3 grains
Camphor	10 grains
Oil of eucalyptus	15 drops
Petrolatum (white)	1 ounce

Mix into ointment and put up in tube.

Squeeze a little ointment out of the tube onto the tip of the little finger and thoroughly anoint both nostrils.

A great deal of this tendency to dryness in the nose is due to habitual lack of humidity in the air of our living- and working-rooms. This is one problem of modern civilization which has not been solved. Wonderful advances have been made in the past fifty years in the heating problems, but the humidification proposition has not kept pace with our heating development. If we could satisfactorily humidify the air in our living-, working-, and sleeping-rooms, I am satisfied that a very large percentage of the colds belonging to this group would immediately disappear; until we can improve our humidification about the best thing we can do is to resort, especially during the night time, to the simple ointments already suggested.

Colds of this irritation type can also be caused by numerous odors, fumes, dust, and gases, as well as by certain articles of diet. Certain susceptible individuals can bring on a cold, a mild bronchitis, or even an asthma attack, by inhaling too much smoke, or breathing in engine fumes.

We have long known that too much starch in the diet of young children definitely predisposes them to colds; but this probably acts by way of increasing the acidity of the blood stream, about which I have already spoken.

Every person should study himself in this way, and try to ascertain if there is any particular thing in his habits of eating and living which is associated with his attacks of colds.

SIX. The hay-fever type of cold—so-called summer colds: In reality these hay-fever or "rose-fever" attacks are not colds, but they are included in this classification because of the fact that many persons do not recognize that they have hay fever, but regard themselves as peculiarly susceptible to certain types of "summer colds."

The management of the hay-fever type

CALIFORNIA

$90.30 Summer round trip
Chicago to San Francisco
—from other points proportionately low.

How far do you have to go for a week-end like this?

THE picture at the top of this page is Yosemite. You can go there from San Francisco any week-end. Half a million people visit this magnificent National Park annually—and California has three more—Lassen, General Grant and Sequoia—besides hundreds of other wonderlands that you should see this summer.

Why not enjoy it* EVERY *week-end?

Wouldn't you like to have a thousand miles of snowy Sierras—a thousand miles of ocean shore and white beaches—groves of Giant Redwoods—vast recreation areas in National Forests—summer homes and camping—your choice of all this, and more, every week-end in the year? When your own home is in or near the cosmopolitan life of San Francisco, you can!

You will find San Francisco as busy a city as you know anywhere. And you should see this side of the picture—the vast shipping, distributing, commercial and manufacturing activities that keep us supplied with the means to enjoy these opportunities for better living that surround us.

Come and See

Take advantage of low summer fares or excellent transcontinental highways and see California for yourself this year. For only $18 more you can make the great swing around the scenic West and take in the whole Pacific Coast. You will find that out here the things you most enjoy in life are easier to reach.

of cold is simply the management of hay fever. Up to the present time the only sure cure is to pack up and clear out—beat it to some locality where they don't have hay fever.

In recent years the use of hay-fever vaccines, especially if repeated year after year, has afforded some relief to many people. But, after all, they only afford transient relief.

HAVING studied the best methods of treating these six different types of colds, let us summarize those which are in general adapted to helping any and all of them, aside from the hay-fever group.

FIRST: By way of prevention try to improve the general circulation. Do the best you can to overcome the tendency toward cold hands and feet. This is where the morning cold bath, properly taken, is of value, and where exercise is of particular service.

SECOND: In the matter of diet, avoid over-eating of such foods as meat, eggs, and cereals. See that the diet is on the "basic" side of the column. That is, that you eat more largely of fruits, vegetables, and dairy products.

THIRD: Do everything possible to maintain a cheerful frame of mind. Worry, depression, and anxiety, are all predisposing causes of those disturbances of circulation and digestion which are contributory to "catching cold."

FOURTH: See that the bowels move regularly, and that you have a good sweat once or twice a week. Keep the skin clean by at least two good warm baths and soap shampoos weekly.

FIFTH: As far as possible, train yourself to stand moderate drafts, sudden changes in temperature, but don't go to extremes. It is all right to make a sane effort to "harden" yourself, but let us be reasonable in these efforts to prevent colds. Particularly avoid wearing too warm under or outer clothing indoors during the winter months.

SIXTH: Remember that gargles and nose sprays should be used in the early hours of infection.

SEVENTH: The most important first aid to be employed in colds is the hot bath, being very particular to avoid chilling when getting out of the bath and into bed. Pay equal attention to the prevention of a secondary and profuse perspiration.

EIGHTH: Take a cathartic the moment you find you are "coming down with a cold." Castor oil is perhaps the best cathartic for general use, though salts act more quickly.

NINTH: It will not be out of place, in all forms of cold, to take a few doses of an alkali, such as common baking soda. Three or four teaspoonful doses, taken thirty minutes apart, is a safe general rule.

TENTH: Go to bed with a hot-water bottle to the feet and keep warm, but have plenty of fresh air in the room.

ELEVENTH: Drink an abundance of liquids, either hot or cold—water, ginger ale, lemonade, orangeade. For the first day take at least one glass of liquid every hour.

TWELFTH: In all colds, take a light diet for the first day or two, preferably liquids; but if the temperature is normal, a more liberal soft diet can be followed.

threw his tiller hard aport, held her there, shot toward the south pier, let her nose right at it, then brought her back, fair into the middle of the channel. His eyes certainly were shining when they came safely against the dock.

"For gosh sakes!" he announced. "That's 'most as much fun as you'd have in Detroit!"

Great concession, this; still, the boys in the pool-room took it up and made stinging fun of the remark.

So, October. And then November, with freezing nights and lashing gales, and the Kid living alone up on the bluff and running down early of lively mornings to see if Ezra was going to chance the savage lake. Ezra was the only one with whom he came in contact who was even civil to him now.

Our electric pump went wrong one stormy morning, and Hank Beauchamp was missing.

"Try the Kid," Fred Harding suggested. "Ezra says he's handy."

So I telephoned the Wayman house, and the Kid was there and said sure, he could fix any electric pump made. He could—mine, at least—and when it was working he remarked that I'd ought to live in Detroit, where you didn't have to fuss with your own water supply.

The pump is in the garage, and as he wiped his hands the Kid looked over the loyal flivver housed there.

"You're the author, ain't you?" he asked.

I admitted it.

"I suppose you've heard about Eddie Guest?" I admitted that too. "He's a Detroit author and, for gosh sakes, you'd ought to write books like Mr. Guest!" Then, with a look at the little old car, "He drives a straight-eight."

The only rejoinder, of course, was that Mr. Guest was as fortunate as he is talented.

"Yup. He certainly gets rich with his books! I know him, too. Why, I've eaten at table with him. Mr. Wayman had him to dinner once." After a moment he added, in the manner one will have when a matter that has long been weighing on his mind comes to conscious thought, "That was when I ate with the family."

SOMEHOW, that suggestion of a happier day carried a quick stab. His face was so thin, so pinched and starved for something; his eyes so bright and filled with such ready enthusiasms! . . . Once he had eaten with the family . . . no more. . . .

A dropped reference such as that sets one thinking, wondering, watching. An orphan, taken into the Wayman home; tolerated for a time, evidently; then edged out and left up here, because the attorney did not want him about and yet felt such responsibility he did not dare turn him loose in a city.

One watches a boy like that. One even loafs in a pool-room nights, and questions and listens and puts two and two together to make a sum greater than four.

An unwanted orphan, with a nebulous past, a discouraging present, and a questionable future. But—hungry for companionship, starved for friends, aching for a place, a place among people!

Recalling that day at the club when he was shouldered out of a party, one deduced that those few weeks when he ran with freedom with other boys and girls of the summer colony made a gala period in his experience. No lad, not even one with his store of enthusiasm, could have carried on his face such a wonderful look when he was with others, were he used to such contacts.

They had wearied of him, when he was having such fun; the town boys, to whom he turned next, now snarled at him; older men repelled his advances.

WITH these theories as guides, one could see the hunger now, in the boy's eyes. It came whenever he spoke of Detroit; it came when he saw a chance to play pool in a group go to someone else; it came when boys talked of their interests, to which they would not admit him.

And, now and then, one saw a little dart of hurt when someone bore down on him too hard. He tried not to betray this; but by mid-November he had stopped much of his talk. He would slip quietly into a room filled with others, and sit alone, hands stuffed into his pockets and shoulders hunched, even when the place was piping hot, watching people, listening with open lips to what they said. He would hang on the words of a gossip; he would laugh aloud all by himself when a joke was made. But he did not try to join groups now. He was out of things; out of the life of the Wayman household, out of the life in our town.

It was only mid-November when these matters became apparent; and he had until July to live in the town before the Waymans would return. A long stretch, that was, for a boy who was missing the only thing he desired.

He stuck by Ezra, though. No blow was too bad for him to go out in, although some of the fishermen had been waiting for those late autumn gales, thinking he would be seasick or show the white feather. They were wrong in this last. He was seasick once, but in a blow that made many an experienced fisherman lose his dinner.

And in that run for home, when green water went completely over the "Kittiwake's" housing, and the little craft staggered and reeled until men lay on the wet twine to keep from being thrown, he only sat, sick as he was, beside the heavy-duty motor, which was not working any too well, and nursed her in.

It was said, rather grudgingly, that he knew more about that engine than anyone except Hank Beauchamp; but Ezra said once that for a kid he understood the lake and boat handling pretty well, which was going a long way for Ezra.

"But what good's it to him?" one with a special antipathy for the Detroit Kid questioned. "What good's he to anybody, includin' himself?"

Spokane River dashing through heart of Spokane.

Visit Spokane
"The City Alluring"

SEE this beautiful thriving city, set in the midst of rugged mountains and silvery lakes (76 within 50 miles).

A modern wonder city, grown from a small hamlet within a single generation.

A city enjoying a period of unquestioned prosperity—new business blocks under construction and more being contracted for, a larger percentage of increase in new industries in 1927 than any other western city, record increases in bank clearings and savings deposits, and less than 3 per cent vacant store space.

Spokane, the "Friendly City," welcomes you to come and share in the prosperous era that Spokane is now embarked on.

Spokane
Capital of the Inland Empire

No other territory of equal size is as rich in natural resources. Its farms produce one-tenth of the country's wheat; it contains the largest remaining stand of white pine; its mountains pour forth a steady yield of mineral wealth; millions are being spent in the development of its immense water power resources—truly a land in the making. Yes; what good, indeed? A lonely boy, with the first snow on the hills, and the days of fishing numbered. When ice floes locked the harbor, he would have nothing whatever to do but sit and watch others and listen; wanting so badly to engage with them. . . .

But even before ice came he was denied the one activity that gave him any happiness, for Ezra Graham slipped and broke his arm badly and could not be about to fish, but sat at home fighting the infection which set in, a sick, sick man.

Ole Larsen ran the "Kittiwake" for those last lifts. He had no time or patience for the Kid, with fretting when storms kept the fleet in, and stirred currents to snarl and tear, with the long gangs of nets waiting for them out yonder.

OH, THE Great Lakes are not mill ponds! We watched that fall, as we do every late season, the great carriers, steaming under forced drafts up toward Chicago, down for the Straits, booming along between gales, making those last bonus-rich trips before winter shuts down; and nights, when the wind yelped and snow flew, lights burned long in the poolroom, and every now and then someone stepped outside to listen for whistles out there. None could tell when the lake would bid for its toll of shipping.

But no disaster was reported, no craft howled for help along our shores . . . not until that early December night when the blizzard came down from the northwest as though in conscious effort to turn the lake upside down and smother all life on the land. Mercury shrank, snow came thick and fine, and the wind blew until shingles buzzed from roofs, and even tight window sashes let knife-thin drafts of zero cold into homes where stoves roared red.

No sound all that night above the gale. Sound, yes; but it could not reach men's ears, not through that mile of mad weather and raging surf. None knew she was there, bottom ripped out on the reef, bow clinging to boulders, stern sagging low in the deeper water inshore. It was daylight before men saw her. . . .

But the word then ran as fast as the gallop of the gale: houses spilled people as we raced for the ice-coated beach to strain eyes through the frequent lifts in the storm to see the hulk. She was an old wooden steam barge; one of the last few of the brave numbers that in another day freighted Great Lakes forests to market, and going, now, the way hundreds of her sisters had gone.

Cabin wreckage churned in the rollers. Excited cries were whipped away by the wind as men strode in the froth, searching for bodies. There were no bodies.

"Look! . . . Ah!" Something black fluttered from the shelter of the pilot house. They were there, then, huddled under the ice-sheathed texas, watching us, safe on land, their hope of life!

Someome ran to call the coast guard from twenty miles away; they'd mount their beach apparatus on a truck, and be here—

"Shoot a line to her?" Savagely, the questioning came. "A mile, man! Thunder, they have to come in their boat. . . . Four hours!"

Ole Larsen shook his head dubiously. "She'll be in pieces den."

Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

No, the guard never could be in time. . . . So we surged back toward the outhouses and the fishing fleet, safely moored. We stood there, watching the surf smash in, smothering the piers. A man never could get a boat out there. We all knew that, and Gunderson said it:

"Not a chance," mournfully, for he knew the lake. "No chance riskin' lifes for lifes nine-tent's gone a'ready!"

Others nodded. And then the Detroit Kid—

"You'd let 'em drown?" he shrilled, elbowing to the center. None gave him reply. It was no hour in which to have heed for a boy's blab. "For gosh sakes, won't anybody even try?" His bright, amazed eyes searched faces which paid him no attention. "For gosh sakes, in Detroit, now, you'd find lots to take a chance!"

"Shut your trap!" Beauchamp, this, nerves touched on the raw by the Kid's challenge.

"Coast guard on the way," was the word. We trailed back along the beach.

Holding his sick arm gingerly, Ezra Graham watched from his parlor window. He told afterward that when the Kid burst into the room his face was white as paper. "They won't go!" he screeched, dancing beside Ezra, who held his marine glasses against a pane to steady them. "None of 'em 'll try!"

"Small chance. . . . No chance!" Ezra was grave and gentle. "I know what the channel's like. And, even if a man got out, there's no lee, yonder. They couldn't get off th' stern; it's awash. She's head to the seas. How'd a man take 'em off, and come through sound himself?"

"But nobody'll try!"

"No. . . . Nobody. Not if Larsen won't. He's a heavy-weather man. He's welcome to the 'Kittiwake.' I'd give my boat to any man who wants—"

"Look! There goes her stack! . . . It won't be long, and the guard's got twenty miles of that sea to buck!"

The kid was gone, whimpering. . . .

OF COURSE, the cough of the "Kittiwake's" motor could not have been heard up there on the wreckage-strewn beach. It was sight of her housing, slipping out behind the north pier that caught an eye. An excited shout, and another surge along the ice-glazed sand.

"Who is it?"

"Ezra's boat!"

"But Ezra's sick!"

"Who're th' fools?" . . . They poised there by the net houses, watching the little craft thrust her nose into the first smother of smashed roller. They saw her falter and mount and poise and pitch and go down, down into the trough, and halt sharply as she struck bottom, for seas like that suck safe depth out of the channel. That took her headway, let her list, and when she rose again she was thrown backward, swerving toward the south pier, as though to mount it and sink herself then and there.

But she did not; she cleared it by an arm's length. She gathered way; she mounted another hill of water, engine racing, taking the crest over her housing, losing boat hook, a buoy or two, and empty gill boxes stacked on top. She plunged on, did not strike in that trough, veered to the northward sharply, lifted, staggered . . . was clear . . . outside!

A FREE DOG BOOK

. . . different . . . worth writing for!

It explains many surprising facts about dog life. It is a regular manual on feeding and care and a valuable reference book on dog diseases and their simple home treatments. It is sent free. Address: H. Clay Glover Co., Dept. A, 119 Fifth Avenue, New York, N.Y.

His Master's Choice . . . is GLOVER'S!

ALL dogs need Spring medicines. Winter has left them low in vitality . . . susceptible to disease . . . . out of condition. At this time of the year, it would be an act of kindness to give your dog Glover's Condition Pills. They are endorsed by dog experts who prescribe them for all breeds and ages. Their tonic properties will quickly put your dog in the pink of physical condition—he will be happier too! His food will taste better, his coat will look better . . . he will act and feel fit!

Another Essential Medicine

Statistics prove that nine dogs out of every ten suffer from worms. Most puppies are afflicted almost immediately after birth. The remedy is simple. Glover's Worm Capsules or, the liquid, Glover's Vermifuge. They are equally effective. Puppies should be treated monthly and older dogs at least four times a year. Veterinarians endorse these famous dog medicines most highly for all breeds—they are safe and sure!

"Ezra couldn't, I tell you. He's sick!" They checked the crowd. No man was missing, and here came Ezra, shawl about his arm. "Who? Who?" Almost desperately, the question was put now.

"The Dee-troit Kid!" someone cried.

"Na! . . . G'wan!"

"He wouldn't—"

"Look!"

They saw him then, for he had opened the starboard door beside the wheel, and was looking out across the tumbling water toward the wreck, a mile yonder. . . . The Detroit Kid, for sure! The fool! Oh, the fool! Again they checked the manpower of town. . . . Alone? Why, it couldn't be!

But he was alone! It is no great trick for a man to handle one of the little tugs alone in fair weather. The housing is not partitioned; the engine is only a step or two from the wheel. But in that gale, in that sea. . . . And attempting a rescue! One man cursed shrilly as Ezra came panting up. The fool, to lose the boat that way!

Then the "Kittiwake" was completely out of sight for the space of a slow breath. She came up again, shaking water from her housing, which was gray now instead of green, from its sheathing of ice. You could picture the Kid alone in there, feet wide spread, gripping the wheel with his skinny hands, holding her on as she jumped and carried and stopped as great rollers boarded her; hearing her groan, seeing water squeeze through the cracks about portholes and doorways; feeling her come back toward even keel, and gain headway when he had a series of lighter seas to buck.

FOR minutes, she would be out of our sight, and a dozen times men swore the fool Kid had lost Ezra's boat; but each time the "Kittiwake" appeared again, rearing and reeling, sending spray high, pounding on toward the black dots under the ice-hung texas, which were lives.

How he checked and did not lose her, none ever knew. But he did, gauging the turn of his motor well, and when he came alongside the barge he had the starboard door open again. The captain told this later. "White as paper, his face was," the captain said, "and his voice sounded like . . . like a tin whistle."

"When I go by, drop an engineer over!" he screeched, as he crawled parallel to the waist of the wreck. "An engineer! I'm alone!"

He crawled on, dropping into deep troughs, too close to the barge by feet, sucked almost against her old sides now; lifted to a level with her rail on crests. . . . And when he was abreast the pilot house, the second engineer, who was young and agile, and not so numbed with cold as his chief, slid and scrambled to the rail. We who had glasses could see him lift a leg over and poise there, ducking his head to flying spray—and then drop.

It looked for a moment as though he had washed off; but he was there, on his knees, hammering on the after door of the housing, which was fastened inside, yelling to be let in before the seas got him.

But the Kid could not let him in. He could not even let go the wheel to give the motor more speed. He had to stand at his wheel, crawling past the stranded ship, edging out beyond her bow before he could leave. Then he lashed the wheel, gave the motor gas, and fell aft to open the doors and drag the ice-sheathed man inside.

So much! How, now, would he get the others? We swore as we speculated on that. How get them? Providence had once prevented his smashing the "Kittiwake" against the side of the wreck. Would it stand by to serve him again? Buried in water half the time, her pilot-house windows were. A man couldn't see to steer, even if he knew enough. . . .

The Kid took no chance on that. We saw him crawl out the stern and knock ice from the little iron railings along the edges of the housing top, so he could have hand-hold; saw him plant his feet astride the tiller, even saw him stoop to yell his orders to the man at the motor.

WHEN he came about out there, women turned away. They were the wives of sailors. They knew there was no chance that he could get her around without capsizing. . . . But he did, that kid from Detroit! He got her around, after repeated trials; he ran before the seas until he was down-wind from the barge, and maneuvered again, squatting behind the cabin when crests came over, and once more crawled up beside that wreck, threatened by every sea. . . .

The pilot house was going then, leaving no shelter for the crew. They clung to ice-crusted lines. Three carried the cook, helpless from cold, to the rail and dropped him. He went down like a sack of meal, and the Kid grabbed him as he slid for the lake, grabbed and held, and still clung to his tiller until a sea helped wash the man back, and by then two more of the barge crew had jumped and could help. . . .

And the fool held his boat there. Smack there! Checked his motor and held her there, while the rest jumped, mind you, inviting the lake to crush him like an egg-shell. . . . But he didn't know that, of course; he never could have known a tenth the risk he took. . . .

"Come in! You're all done! Let one of us take her in," the mate of the wreck yelled when the Kid let her swing off and started home.

He could not speak at first, they said. He just shook his head, ice of his jacket collar falling off in flakes. "You don't know the piers," he piped. "I'll—"

He did not say what he would do. He just did it; brought her home before the seas, with our men strung along the piers, lines about their middles, knowing he would pile up, ready to go into the surf and drag those dying men to safety. . . . Eleven men, perishing with cold in the "Kittiwake," with water to their shins now, which she had taken through the open after doors. . . . Eleven men, ready to die, and a spindly kid who couldn't have known what he was doing.

You could see his face when he got her into the breakers, white as paper, indeed, livid as frost on a window. His cap was gone and ice was in his hair. He brought her across the bar, smothered to his knees in froth, motor wide open, driving at that narrow slot in the beach. The current got her, and we saw him kick frantically at the tiller.

She swung off, almost broached to, steadied, rose on a roller and hit the south pier broadside with a crash like a salute.

Re-roof the "Genasco way"— right over your old wood shingles

Front view

The patented "key," invisible on the completed roof, locks each Genasco Latite Shingle tightly to those underneath.

Back view

The turned-under corner holding the "key" makes a double-thick butt which gives the finished roof a distinctive texture.

Genasco Latite Shingles demonstrate their economy right at the start—and they prove it through the years. They save money—when they are used it is unnecessary to tear off the worn-out wood shingles. There is no dirt, labor or expense—and they give you a better roof, because the old shingles serve as additional insulation, making your home warmer in winter and cooler in summer.

Genasco Latite Shingles are particularly adapted for laying over old wood shingles. They have a patented "key" which locks each shingle securely to those underneath, and because they adhere closely to each other, they make practically a one-piece roof. And they are so inexpensive that they are economical for new buildings as well as for old

The protection they offer is the unusual protection of Trinidad Native-Lake Asphalt Cement—made from Trinidad Lake Asphalt, famous as a street-paving material for more than a half-century. Genasco Latite Shingles are made of tough, long-fibred, asphalt-saturated rag felt, and they are also coated on both sides with this superior asphalt cement—nature's own seasoned waterproofer. The exclusive "Sealbac" undercoating is valuable because it protects against condensation from beneath and assists in the closer adhesion of the shingles on the roof.

Waterproof, weather-resistant, fire-retardant, long-lasting—qualities that every shingle roof should have. And Genasco Latite Shingles have enduring beauty, besides. The four unfading colors—rich warm red, cool sage green, blue-black and the harmoniously blended Mix-Tone—adapt themselves to the architecture and color scheme of every home.

Whether you are going to roof or re-roof, whether the building is a home, barn or garage, you can't afford to go ahead without looking fully into the merits of Genasco Latite Shingles. At all leading builders, contractors, building supply dealers, roofers and carpenters. Or write us for complete information—use the coupon today.

Are you being fooled by the . . .

New Blade Fallacy?

It isn't hard to believe that, because a blade is new it ought to give one a good shave. Lots of good men are fooled by that thought and thereby miss getting really fine shaves.

If a new blade is ready for shaving when it comes out of the wrapper, it is just pure luck. A blade may have had a bully fine edge when it left the factory, but highly tempered steel is like a temperamental child—it needs a good stropping frequently.

This is interesting

Fine razors have edges of tiny invisible teeth. Temperature changes, jolts and handling get these teeth out of alignment. That's why a blade pulls. Stropping smoothes them into line and restores a keen cutting edge.

A few turns on Twinplex puts an edge on a NEW blade that is a marvel for smooth shaving. And it's so easy to strop with Twinplex. No fussing—no reversing blade. Just slip blade in and turn—strops both edges at once and reverses blade at every turn, just as a barber does. You can't fail.

30 seconds a day will keep one blade marvelously keen, for weeks of the smoothest shaves you've ever known. Shaving is also easier and quicker with Twinplex, for a keen blade is a quick safe shaver.

You can now buy a Twinplex at any dealer's for as little as $2.50. It pays for itself in a few months and saves more than its cost each year thereafter. Other attractive Twinplex models at $3.50 and $5.00.

Send for the DULL HOUSE and FREE NEW blade stropped

Clever little Dull House solves the problem of disposing of old blades safely. Send 10¢ for it and we will also send you FREE one brand NEW blade stropped on Twinplex, just to show you what real shaving is. Name your razor.

Splinters flew, and the Kid reeled; but he had his arms spread across the housing for purchase, and did not lose his feet. She came in, ramming toward the north pier now; but the motor was in reverse, and she only grazed it as she slid to her berth. . . .

Gunderson had a fire roaring in his nethouse stove. The cook came in first, to the hot blankets. He moaned a little, pain from his smashed hip hurting through the anesthesia of cold. The rest spilled out, three of them collapsing on the dock. And the Kid. . . . Well, he grinned queerly as the men he had saved came up, fighting through his legs, which impeded their way out of the housing to the stern deck. He grinned a queer, white grin, and did not move, and then Ezra, seeing, said sharply:

"Get a hand adze, he's froze fast!"

Indeed, the sleeves of his jacket, from elbow to wrist, were welded to the cabin top. They chopped briskly, gingerly.

"That's good," he said faintly, when his second arm came free—and pitched sideways. They caught him of course.

It was noon before the Kid came around. He moaned from time to time, but that was nothing. The cook was yelling murder as the doctor set his hip, stopping that job now and then to come and feel the thin wrist of the Detroit Kid. Twice he jabbed that arm with a needle. A dozen men stood ready to do the doctor's bidding.

To help with the cook, yes; but mostly to help with the Kid. Mostly that—to help the Kid. Gunderson stoked his stove. Every hot-water bottle in town was there. For the crew, of course, if they really needed them. But for the Kid first; the Detroit Kid first. And steaming broth ready for the Kid. . . .

On one side of him sat Ezra; on the other, the steam barge captain.

"Twenty minutes," the captain kept repeating. "Twenty minutes more out there, and—" He never quite finished what he had started to say.

Noon. The Kid opened those big eyes. They were dull now, and he stared blankly at Ezra; then at the captain; then at the wall of faces about and above him—drawn faces, anxious, strained faces.

"All right, Kid?" Ezra asked, as the doctor came, and stared hard, and felt, and grinned, as a man will when he has done a good job. For a long time the Kid did not answer. "Feel better, Detroit?"

His eyes showed some life then. His colorless lips twitched, and he scowled a little. . . . More life in his eyes—the wraith of a smile.

"Fine!" You read his lips, rather than heard the word.

"Awful cold out there, son," Ezra said, leaning low. "Awful cold!"

The Kid stirred.

"For gosh . . ." he began, ever so faintly. It was hard for him to go on, but he did: ". . . sakes. . . . Don't know what . . . cold is . . . 'less you . . . been in . . . Detroit when . . . it's cold."

Ezra made a funny sound and stood up. One man in that amphitheatre of faces laughed dryly. Another—a young man, one of our strongest lads—brushed his eyes. No one said anything. They did not look at one another. They were so happy. One of their own had gone out to face grave danger, and had come home, unharmed, unchanged!

Adventures of a Bargain Hunter

fill. There is a very wealthy man in a small Southern town for whom I regularly buy corned beef, because I know a New York butcher who puts up corned beef exactly the way my client likes it.

"A charming New England spinster depends upon me to supply her pet canary with his favorite brand of seed. Another woman—an American who for many years has lived in London, with the finest linen shops in the world at her elbow—orders all her linens through me. Just recently, I shipped her thirty-six yards of sheeting. Still another client, a Frenchwoman married to an American in business in Paris, has me send her quantities of silk hose.

"But the strangest request I ever got came from a young mining engineer in a remote section of Wyoming who thought he wanted a teacher for the district school, but who really wanted a wife.

"Shortly after he landed in Wyoming, the young engineer found himself on the school board of the district in which his headquarters were located. Eventually, he became chairman of the board, and his fellow members, scattered ranchmen, largely left it to him to keep a teacher on the job. This was not so easy as it sounds. For several years, he imported teachers from Seattle. But as fast as he got the young women installed behind a desk, along would come a likely cowboy or an enterprising miner, marry the teacher, and leave the young chairman holding the bag.

"Finally, in desperation, he thought of me as the person who used to supply his sisters back East with any- and everything on short notice. He wrote me about his problem, and asked me to help him out. It was easy to tell from his letter that he was shy and homesick and hungry for romance.

"'I want you to pick out a sort of delicate girl,' he informed me. 'One that these cowpunchers won't fall for. All those girls who came out from Seattle were husky creatures who could brand a cow, or wield a shovel in a pinch. I don't want any more of that kind. They are a total loss as schoolmarms. Anyhow, if anybody marries the new teacher, I'm going to do it myself. It's dog-gone lonesome out here a million miles from nowhere. P. S. I like girls with blue eyes!

"Well, perhaps you'll have a hard time believing it," smiled Mrs. Leeds, "but I had heard some friends of mine talking about a girl who was desperately trying to raise enough money to get out of New York on account of her health. Her lungs weren't any too strong, and she was awfully run down. She hadn't a relative in the world. I called up my friends and got the girl's name and address. I told them that I thought I had a teaching job

You may have your favorite shaving soap but —

USE BARBASOL ON ONE SIDE—YOUR FAVORITE SHAVING SOAP ON THE OTHER

Barbasol
Skin Freshener
A tonic stimulant. After shaving—after bathing—any time. 65c at all druggists

—LET YOUR FACE DECIDE

YOU shave the same way every day. Same old soap. Same old brush. So much rub-in. So many towels. More soap . . . more brush . . . more lathering—man, it's a HABIT!

We'd like to change that habit. Not only to get a new customer, but to give you a better shave —easier, faster, smoother—with Barbasol.

So we make you this proposition:

Make this 3-day test

Use your favorite shaving soap, just the way you use it every day—but only on one-half of your face.

Now wet down the other side of your face—with hot water or cold, only so it's wet. Then spread on a film of creamy, cooling Barbasol. No brush. No lathering. No rub-in. Just shave! Like this:

1—Wash the face {and leave it wet}
2—Spread on Barbasol {but don't rub in}
3—Shave!

We'll leave it to your face! Soap side's full of razor pull and smart and beard resistance. Barbasol side is all cool and soft—pliant with the natural oils left right in the skin. Younger looking, cheerier, cleaner!

All druggists 35c and 65c. Send 10c for generous trial tube.

Performance is the Supreme Test!

MILLIONS of tire miles on Silvertowns have proved these facts regarding Goodrich construction:

First, the hinge-center tread eliminates uneven, wasteful tread wear.

Second, the rubber-ized cords of maximum strength and equal stretch reduce fabric breaks and bruises to a minimum.

Third, the Goodrich Water Cure results in a uniform toughening of the rubber, which has set new mileage standards.

Goodrich dealers, everywhere, are ready to equip you with Silvertowns. Make performance the supreme test!

out West for her. Then, instead of inquiring about her qualifications, I asked if she were small and had blue eyes!

"In answer to a note I dropped her, the young lady came to call on me. She couldn't have weighed more than a hundred and five pounds and her eyes were as blue as cornflowers. I fell in love with her at once, and I was sure that my client in Wyoming would do the same, once he saw her. In short, I was pretty certain that those two lonely young things were just made for each other. So I packed the child off with a light heart.

"THREE months later, I got this telegram from the boy:

"Please be on look-out for new teacher Stop Prefer settled woman who will make life work of job Stop Mailing order for wedding outfit Stop Very happy Stop Thank you forever.

"And I give you my word that for days I went around feeling as if cupid wings had sprouted between my respectable middle-aged shoulders!"

Mrs. Leeds sighed gently.

"Thank goodness," she added, "the vast majority of my clients are not romantic young men in search of life partners, but extremely practical women in search of wardrobes for themselves and their families and furnishings for their homes. During the past thirty years, I have had more than twenty thousand names on my books. At present, about two thirds of these names represent active accounts.

"Sometimes I don't hear from a woman in two or three years, and then she'll bob up again and want a trousseau for herself, or for her daughter. Or maybe she needs a hank of wool to finish the sweater she's knitting for her husband's Christmas present. And I work just as hard to please her in one instance as the other. That's plain business sense. A bit of embroidery thread painstakingly matched has been known to lead to a big order later on."

"What is the smallest order you ever filled?" I was curious to know.

"I think the smallest order I ever got came a few days ago from an Ohio client of long standing," laughed Mrs. Leeds. "She simply wrote on a postcard: 'Please send me a paper of needles and a spool of black cotton thread number sixty.' That woman has become so dependent upon me to shop for her that it actually requires less mental effort on her part to write me than it takes to telephone down-town for what she wants.

"The biggest single order that ever dropped into my lap came from half way around the world a few years ago. It was a request from a couple of young men, who were 'baching it' on a New Zealand ranch, to furnish a seven-room house for them from cellar to garret. These boys are the sons of a customer whom I have served for fifteen years, or more. They hate shopping for themselves, and they insist upon having everything American. They say that American furniture keeps them from being too homesick for the States. I spent nearly twelve thousand dollars before I got those boys to feeling reasonably at home. The most expensive items on their list were an electric washing machine and a player piano, both of which they had set down under the head of 'labor-saving devices.'

Precision machines eliminate all possibility of human error in attaining the super-accurate unit-balance of Nash rotating parts.

CARE IN BUILDING MAKES NASH A FINER MODE OF MOTORING

IF you could go through the great Nash factories and actually see the extra care and finer design which go into Nash construction, you would certainly decide you would rather have a Nash.

At one point after another, in the creation of this great motor car, C. W. Nash has established precision methods and machines which put extra hours of careful workmanship into every Nash.

Every Nash motor is tested and tested, again and again, to be certain it is right. Precision balancing machines balance Nash crankshaft, clutch and flywheel all as one unit to make the Nash 7-bearing motor the smoothest, most durable type on earth.

Another instance of Nash care in design and workmanship: Nash 4-wheel brakes are the safer, more efficient, 2-way brakes, instead of the usual, single-action type. They are fully equalized, as well, to simplify their maintenance.

Nash cars follow the straight and narrow path of flawless performance, they give their owners more pleasure-of-driving and joy-of-owning, because they are built so well.

Nash really is a finer mode of motoring!

TIRE VALVES—TIRE GAUGES

"Undoubtedly, the easiest penny I ever earned was when a client with whom I was shopping for Oriental rugs liked and bought the very first one that the salesman showed her. The price of the rug was three thousand dollars. My commission was three hundred dollars. The time consumed in the transaction was a little over three minutes. That was like picking up money in the street. But it is the sort of thing that happens perhaps once in the career of an exceptionally long-lived and lucky shopping agent.

"Frequently, young men call on me to help select gifts for their brides-to-be. Nearly all the pearl necklaces I have bought for clients were ordered under such circumstances. But the final selection was made only after long and arduous shopping. The handsomest string of pearls I ever purchased went to a young man in Alaska who was getting ready to receive his fiancée from England.

"A bride's trousseau nearly always means a good big bill. And, besides, it is such good fun to shop with a bride-to-be. She usually goes around with her head wrapped in a beautiful pink and white cloud through which the dullest clerk can spy a wedding veil and orange blossoms. This means that we get the very best attention. All the world still loves a lover!

"I have had several ten-thousand-dollar brides, but I never enjoyed one of them more than I enjoyed a little girl from Virginia who came to me with three hundred dollars, which positively had to cover everything, including blue gingham curtains for the kitchen windows. Just to watch that child's eyes when we managed to squeeze in an unexpected bit of finery was to catch a glimpse of heaven on earth. I knew that she was going to make something beautiful of her married life.

"I WISH that all my clients would tell me frankly at the outset just how much they can afford to pay for the articles they order. It is sometimes difficult to determine from the quality of the stationery whether "John" is assistant cashier, or the president of the bank.

"Some women seem to have the notion that a purchasing agent will give better service if she thinks she is shopping for wealthy patrons. This is not true at all. The bulk of the professional shopper's business is with women who can't afford more than thirty-five or forty dollars for an afternoon frock, and who really hope for something 'different' at twenty-nine-fifty.

"And, of course, it's much better business for us to please the thousands of twenty-nine-fifty clients who keep on ordering year after year, than it is to make a hit with the moneyed minority who send to us between regular shopping expeditions to New York, or some other large city.

"You might be interested to know that very few of my clients try to dodge their bills. However, there are always a good many women who let their bills run until they are frightened by the sum total, and insist that my secretary has made a mistake in the bookkeeping. Being human, occasionally we do make mistakes, but ninety-nine times out of a hundred an itemized statement covering the whole period for which the client owes us simply shows her that she has bought a good deal more than she likes to remember.

"There's one thing I want to say to the distinct credit of the modern young wife: As a rule, she is much more careful of her husband's money than her mother was of her father's. In most cases, the bride of to-day held down a job before her marriage, and she knows just how a dollar comes and just how far it ought to go.

"If a client doesn't pay her bills with reasonable regularity, the shopping agent loses money on her account. You see, we make no charge for our services to a customer. Our income is derived entirely from the commission which the shops allow us. The client pays for an article which she buys through us exactly what she would pay if she went into the store and made the purchase in person. However, because a shopping agent buys several thousand dollars' worth of merchandise a month, the stores can afford to give her a commission on her purchases.

"This commission is never more than ten per cent, and in the smaller shops it is often less than that. If the purchasing agent fails to meet her bills at the stores promptly every thirty days, she loses her commission. And if her clients do not pay her promptly she simply has to borrow money from the banks in order to keep her credit good with the shops. A slow-paying customer's account eats up much of the profit on those that are paid on the dot.

"Naturally," Mrs. Leeds added soberly, "we have to be pretty careful about taking on new customers. A woman who wants to open an account with a purchasing agent is required to furnish the same sort of references she would have to offer in opening an account with a big metropolitan store.

"Of course," said Mrs. Leeds, "we sometimes run into unscrupulous people.

"Recently a shopper friend of mine had a rather embarrassing experience. Early one morning, a few weeks ago, she had a telephone call from a valued out-of-town client whom she had never seen. She met the woman by appointment at a well-known shop and helped her select half a dozen gowns to try on. While they were in the fitting-room, the client decided that she liked another dress at which she had looked in the main salon. My friend accompanied the saleswoman to make sure that the right one was brought. When the two returned, the client had exercised her feminine prerogative and changed her mind. She had settled on one gown of the lot already in the fitting-room and did not want the bother of trying another.

"BEFORE the two women left the floor, it was discovered, through the rigid checking system which obtains in this particular shop, that one of the dresses carried into the fitting-room had not been returned to its proper case. The saleswoman was questioned. She had been occupied with noting some slight alterations to be made in the purchased garment and had not counted the dresses, as was her careful custom. No mention of the matter was made to the client of course.

"Later, at lunch, the client, in crossing her knees, inadvertently exposed several inches of the handsome silk fringe which the shopping agent recalled as trimming the misplaced gown. My friend's wits worked quickly. Throwing back her head, she laughed heartily, and said:

"'Oh, Mrs. Blank, you'll never guess what you've done. You've put on your dress over that gown of Blake's!'

"The client was naturally embarrassed, and asked my friend if they could not go to her hotel a few blocks away and have the frock returned from there.

"The shopping agent acquiesced. But the incident set her to thinking, and she quietly dispatched a telegram to the home town of her supposed client. It developed that Mrs. Blank was at home, and that the woman masquerading under her name was a former governess of the family, who had always enjoyed the complete confidence of her employers.

"My friend never heard from the masquerading governess again. Possibly this was her initial experience in shoplifting and she concluded that once was enough.

"OCCASIONALLY a woman tries to 'put one over' the stores by ordering a gown in a great hurry for some special event—a dinner, or a reception, or a week-end party. The dress is usually returned with the explanation that it arrived just a few hours too late to be of any service. But faint perspiration marks, or the barely perceptible crease of a new hem line tell a different story.

"Many of the shops were forced to make a ruling against sending out hats under any consideration. So many women found that they had to wear the hats to a bridge party, or to Easter service, to discover that they were unbecoming!

"And it isn't always personal apparel that suffers in this way. There was one woman who sent to me from a small Mid-Western town for a number of expensive hangings, curtains, rugs, and even some elaborate sofa pillows, odd pieces of silver, and candles of a special color and size. She was new to me, but her name stood high up in the social "Who's Who" of her state, and her banking references were quite satisfactory. As she had described her wants in detail, and as I had been fortunate in finding almost exactly what she wanted at reasonable prices, I was greatly surprised to have the whole order very promptly returned as unsatisfactory.

"Imagine my feelings, a few days later, when a letter came from another client in the same state telling of an elaborate wedding reception which she had attended at the home of my new patron. My correspondent described handsome rugs and other 'fixings' which I identified as those I had sent down. Little did she dream that all these things were back in New York.

"We soon get on to such impostors, however, and quietly put their names on the black list. This means that when they request service of a member of the Associated Purchasing Agents, they are regretfully informed that we are unable to execute their commission.

"THE real and ever-present bane of the professional shopper's life is the woman who sends the same order to two or three of us at the same time. She seems to think that New York is so large that she runs no risk of crossing her wires. As a matter of fact, most purchasing agents buy at pretty much the same places.

"There was the case of the Jones twins, two small-town girls who always wanted their frocks exactly alike. One day I got an order from them for a couple of turquoise taffeta evening gowns of a certain style. I found what they wanted, and placed the order. 'You're getting the last two turquoise taffeta frocks in the store,' the saleswoman confided as she made out my slip. 'We've booked out-of-town orders for half a dozen of these dresses to-day.'

"Her comment gave me an idea and I started a little investigation on my own responsibility. When I finished, I knew that those pestiferous twins had ordered similar gowns from two other purchasing agents, intending to keep those best liked and return the others. Result: The store completely out of blue taffeta evening gowns and very likely not a sale out of the lot. When we discover that a client is persistently unfair to us and the shops in this way, we are obliged to write her name off our books in self-defense.

"Experts," smiled Mrs. Leeds, "have figured out that a woman who shops all day in crowded stores actually works harder than a farmer who plows a ten-acre corn field. And the joke of it is that she can remain under one roof and cover more ground. The average male is inclined to make light of such statements as these; but a couple of hours in a big New York department store with a floor space that totals from fifteen to thirty acres will make him sing a different tune.

"Personally, I love to shop. On six days of every week—except during the time I am away on my vacation—I start out at nine o'clock in the morning, and I rarely get back home before six. And I am never too tired to look forward to the next day's shopping. Certainly, it seems to agree with me. I haven't missed ten days in twenty years on account of illness."

feeling. The atmosphere of that ward was almost merry! A brave lot of men!

There was "Snowball," a little negro who, while sliding down a curving stair banister, had fallen and broken his head. There was a big German, whose hand had been caught in a bread-mixing machine. There was "Red Eye," a man whom "Snowball" had named because of an inflamed eye that looked terrible, then funny, as I became accustomed to it. And there were many others, one with his legs trussed up on something like a step-ladder, so that the many fractures suffered in an accident might heal properly.

Horrible sights I saw daily—or what I had always imagined would be horrible sights. Other "new men" came in as the days went on, and I felt constrained to do my part toward helping them. I became merry, hopeful. I felt worthwhile! The sight of bleeding men no longer struck

More than a million are riding with ETHYL

IT took seven years to develop Ethyl Gasoline—but it took only months for the motoring public to discover its advantages.

Today more than a million car owners are riding with Ethyl. They are enjoying a new standard of engine performance — more power on hills and heavy roads, faster pick-up, reduced gear-shifting, a cooler, smoother motor under all driving conditions. And to the owners of the new high compression automobiles, Ethyl is giving a still bigger thrill.

Follow the army of Ethyl users to the nearest Ethyl pump. It is identified by the trademark shown above. And the price of Ethyl Gasoline is simply the price of good gasoline, plus the few extra pennies the "ETHYL" ingredient costs.

Ethyl makes good gasoline better.

ETHYL GASOLINE CORPORATION
25 Broadway, New York City

ETHYL GASOLINE

Facts about Ethyl Gasoline

ETHYL GASOLINE was developed by General Motors Research to provide a more efficient fuel for internal combustion engines.

It is formed by adding Ethyl brand of anti-knock compound ("ETHYL" fluid) to selected motor gasoline in an amount sufficient to utilize the higher compression created by carbon deposits or advanced engine design.

"ETHYL" fluid is a concentrated liquid containing tetraethyl lead which has the property of controlling the combustion rate of gasoline. It is a patented product.

Only oil refining companies licensed to sell Ethyl Gasoline can mix "ETHYL" fluid with their gasoline. In every case the amount of "ETHYL" fluid must be sufficient to meet a definite standard of "anti-knock" quality rigidly controlled by the Ethyl Gasoline Corporation.

Ethyl Gasoline is colored red for identification. The color has nothing whatever to do with its performance. It takes more than dye to make "anti-knock" gasoline.

Ethyl Gasoline increases the performance of any automobile engine—whatever its compression—whatever the climate or other driving conditions.

If your car is designed to operate on ordinary gasoline, the use of Ethyl Gasoline will:

Eliminate "that knock" and power loss.

Make carbon deposits a source of extra power. For carbon increases compression and Ethyl Gasoline is the high compression fuel.

Give a smoother and better pulling engine, particularly on hills and heavy roads.

Reduce gear-shifting and increase acceleration, thereby making traffic driving easier.

Cut down vibration, thereby reducing engine wear and tear and depreciation.

Save you the expense of carbon removal and other repairs caused by "knocking" and carbon formation.

Give more power per gallon for your fuel bills—and more mileage as compression is increased by carbon deposits.

If your car is a high compression car, just remember that Ethyl Gasoline made it possible and its use is necessary to obtain maximum performance.

Ethyl Gasoline is the yardstick by which other gasolines are measured.

Outselling because it is the better Spark Plug

TODAY, still more than ever before, Champion merits the world-preference which enables it to outsell, two to one, everywhere that motor cars are used.

Champion, the better spark plug, has always led in spark plug development and has contributed vitally to the progress of the internal combustion engine.

For five years this preponderance of sales has belonged to Champion by right of superior spark plug performance; and it is Champion's pledge that nothing shall ever be left undone to increase the satisfaction of the millions of Champion users.

terror to my heart, as it always had done before I was blown up.

I had two private nurses there in the ward, which brought me some distinction among the patients, for none of the others had even one special nurse. I had screens about my bed when I wanted them. The "old-timers" soon caught on to the fact that I was supposed to be better off than they. They found that I had some education, and so they came oftener to talk with me. I had spent my life in acquiring education. They wanted to know what I knew. I was embarrassed to think that some of them looked up to me. For I didn't feel above anyone. I often thought of my plight and of theirs, and knew that, fundamentally, I was not as strong as they. "Here I am," I would say to myself, "supposed to be socially above these other men; but we are all on a level in this ward, except that the others have helped me more than I could possibly help them." I, in my secret thoughts, and I hope in my actions, looked up to those physically robust men who could stand pain better than I could, and who were superior to the haunting and silly fears that had plagued me. They thought they could learn from me, but it was I who was the learner!

FOR three weeks I was in that ward, and they were the greatest three weeks of my life. I would not trade them for any other similar period of time. I recovered there from my burns bruises, and gashes. More than that, I began there the recovery from my almost lifelong fears. I was shamed out of them. I was led out of them by strong men—Negroes, Irishmen, Swedes, Germans, Italians—thugs, some of them; honest laborers, most of them.

My dread of hospitals vanished. I learned what should always have been an obvious fact about hospitals: they are places where people are taken to get well, not to die. The doctors and the nurses strive with all their skill to make you get well when you are in a hospital. They regard your illness as a problem for them to solve; you are not just a specimen for them to "practice" on. Everyone in a hospital is working night and day to get you out alive and well.

After a week or two in the ward, I recalled a case of a llama over in the Zoölogical Park. He had an abscess on the jaw, and when the doctor went to treat it, the animal cut up like mad. It was a trying job to rope him and hold him while the doctor lanced the abscess. But the instant the operation was done, the llama became quiet, and after that he would almost walk to the gate of his enclosure to meet the doctor. He had not understood the purposes of the surgeon, any more than I had understood hospitals.

What an entertaining place a ward really is, if you can measure up to its high requirements in courage and geniality. A funny place, at times, for the "veterans" regard themselves as somewhat superior by virtue of their long acquaintance with what to a newcomer is novel. I became almost a veteran before I left. When other new men were brought in, I found myself feeling some sense of responsibility about them. Also, I felt just a little wise, for they were neophytes, while I was an old member of the great Fraternity of the Hospital Ward.

Occasionally there came to my bedside a patient who was somewhat of a nuisance, because he liked so to talk about his ailments. But he was allowed to do this only because he had been there a long time. No new man can bemoan his fate. "It ain't good for him, nor for us," says the fellow who is just beginning to get well. A patient in a private room is alone with his troubles. He can groan and mumble his prayers for help. But not in a ward! For there, his feelings are reflected in the feelings of others, and ward patients are amazingly thoughtful of fellow-sufferers. Many naturally so, because those who are taken to wards know rather intimately the troubles of mankind. There has been nothing aloof about their lives. They have not had the means to escape the sorrier aspects of life. And those who are not naturally thoughtful are required by the stern discipline of the ward to become so. In a ward, it's "Shut up or get out," for the man who will not join in the general spirit of recovery.

Hospital wards have their leaders, though no one would ever guess this unless he had himself been a patient in one. Leadership springs either from long "service" as a patient, or from uncommonly high courage and cheerfulness.

You learn all about your neighboring patients in the ward. In a few days you know who hit them, what hit them, or where they fell from. You know what they do for a living, and what they would like to do. A gossipy, intimate, confidential, helpful place is a ward!

I HOPE I shall not be blown up again, even though my first experience in that line resulted in the most profoundly helpful three weeks in my life. But if I should again be the victim of an accident, or again be sick and have to be taken to a hospital, I trust that I shall have sense and courage enough to tell them to put me into a room with others, where I'd have to get well for the sake of those around me.

Of course I'm not well yet. No man can recover quickly from a terrific shock. But I look twenty years younger than I did before that explosion in my office, and except for somewhat shattered nerves, I feel twenty years younger. I now can tackle new tasks with eagerness. I plan and look ahead, instead of worrying about the hundred uncompleted little tasks of daily life. The weight that was on my mind is lifting, thanks to the discipline of the accident ward in Fordham Hospital.

YOU have thought, of course, that you would like to retire when still young, and spend the rest of your life doing nothing except the things that you wanted to do. Well, a certain man tried that very trick. He retired when he was forty—quit absolutely. But the results of leisure disappointed him. At home, he was in the way. At his club, other men regarded him with suspicion. For a year or so he stuck it out, and then went back to work. He tells you his experiences in next month's magazine.

The Dental Profession Studies Dingy Film on Teeth

Film forms on teeth and gives them that dull, "off-color" look. It fosters serious tooth and gum disorders

Remove it in the way now urged by foremost dental opinion of the day

Send Coupon for 10-Day Tube Free

SMILES ENVIED TODAY often remained unnoticed yesterday. Then Pepsodent played its all-transforming part and now gleaming teeth are seen on every hand. Tooth and gum troubles are on the decrease.

TWO things you may rightfully expect from the dentifrice you use, says a famous New York dental specialist: "That teeth be sparkling white and that you be protected from the commoner tooth and gum disorders."

A dentifrice that fulfills present scientific standards will accomplish these results by removing the film that forms on teeth. And it's to this film that "off-color" teeth and many tooth and gum disorders now are traced.

Thus in widespread use among dentists and their patients is the special film-removing dentifrice called Pepsodent.

SMILES THE BIGGEST THING in being beautiful, says Miss Dorothy Kenyon. Millions, today, know that and employ Pepsodent to make teeth dazzling white.

Why FILM may lead to trouble

Run your tongue across your teeth and you will feel a slippery, viscous coating. That is film.

It clings to teeth so stubbornly that ordinary brushing will not successfully remove it. It gets into crevices and stays.

Stains from food and smoking sink into film and make teeth dull and dingy.

Germs breed in film by the millions. And they, with the tartar film develops into, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Film invites the acids of decay. Thus before new ways were found to remove it tooth and gum disorders were startlingly on the increase.

Special way removes film

Under close direction of leading dental authority a special film-removing tooth paste, known as Pepsodent, was developed. It acts to curdle that film and then in gentle safety to remove it.

In this development the world has gained a new conception of what a dentifrice should be and do. Dentists by the thousands tell us this.

Fights Decay—Firms Gums

Pepsodent also acts to increase the alkalinity of saliva and thus to neutralize fermenting starch deposits that cause the acids of decay.

Pepsodent aids to firm the gums.

Thus, Pepsodent answers fully these requirements of the dental profession of today. That's why in 58 nations its acceptance among dentists is widespread.

Take 10 days to see

White and sparkling teeth must be kept film free. Healthy teeth and gums must likewise have daily film protection.

All dentists know the solution lies in Pepsodent. Send coupon for 10-day tube.

Note how soon teeth grow whiter and brighter. How soon gums firm and harden.

See your dentist twice each year. Use Pepsodent twice each day. That marks the height of modern tooth care.

When They Smile

The world sees gleaming teeth free from "off-color" film

HOW do they care for their teeth? What do they do to keep smiles sparkling white? That is what others ask and wonder about the charming people pictured here.

For smiles to gleam and sparkle, first film must be removed from teeth. For film makes teeth gray, "off color," and gives that dingy look.

Ordinary brushing fails. Get the special film-removing dentifrice called Pepsodent. It cleanses the teeth completely. Then polishes and gives them high lustre in safety to enamel.

Wherever you go today you see flashing smiles the twice daily use of Pepsodent is bringing.

"Maybe It's All I'll Ever Get, But It's Worth While"

hung in a gallery. I am not saying this will be true. The very evening I was there an evidently prosperous gentleman also called. After John Kane had sent him away, I asked curiously who he was.

"He's a picture collector," Kane explained, but with a gesture of impatience. "He's been here before. But he doesn't know . . ."

The words trailed off into silence, but I could understand the situation. If Kane is a genius, on the verge of being "discovered," the collector wants to pick up some of his paintings for the traditional song. He sees their evident crudeness, hesitates, yet is afraid of "missing a trick." He would like to say, some day: "Here's a John Kane I picked up before he became famous."

To a certain extent, John Kane became famous last October, for the papers were quick to seize the sensational news that a Pittsburgh house painter had "got into" the International Exhibition. Reporters interviewed him. News cameras photographed him. Visitors to the gallery hunted up his painting and stared at it with morbid curiosity.

NO ONE ever will know just what emotions were stirred in John Kane's mind by all this powwow. To me, he seemed a little bewildered, more than a little distrustful.

It is as if he had been dealing with grim facts; solid things, even in the shadows where he has lived and worked. And he is afraid of this first ray of hope! Afraid that it is an ignis fatuus; only a flickering will-o'-the-wisp. He turns away from it, to go on groping in the old familiar darkness where he feels at home.

He does not talk easily; and much of the time his voice was so low that the roar and shriek of the trains, passing almost continuously, made his words inaudible. I must have looked resentfully toward the half-open window, for he got up and closed it.

"Living alone here, with no one to talk to," he said, "I forget about all that." And he pointed toward the tracks across the street.

"Then you haven't a family?" I asked.

"Yes; but my two daughters are married and have moved away from Pittsburgh. They have babies of their own now. They needed my wife; so she's been first with one and then with the other."

"You've an Irish twist of the tongue," I said. "Were you born in Ireland."

"No," he replied, with the smile which, but only rarely, lighted his somber eyes. "I was born in Scotland. But my father and mother had come there from Galway, in Ireland. So you're not far wrong."

The story of his life came out by piecemeal; in sudden flashes of eager responsiveness, which as quickly died down into his habitual repression.

Many of the things he said to me came as the result of, I hope, delicate but persistent probing. Sometimes he would look up with a quick, puzzled glance, as if he was surprised at what he had put into words. I am inclined to believe that, out of the depths of John Kane's mind that night, things came to the surface which he, himself, had not known were there.

BEFORE we finished, he answered the question which had been my one motive in going to see him. All that went before it was a part of that answer. So now, from the latest chapter of his story let us go back to the first.

John Kane was born, "nigh onto sixty years ago," in the little town of West Calder, thirteen miles out of Edinburgh. His parents, as you know, were from Ireland; and Ireland, then, though as lovely as it is now, was "a terrible hard place for a poor man to live."

Especially hard for a young couple with the hope of a family to bring up, so the Kanes moved to Scotland. But shillings didn't grow on Scotch thistles any more than they did on Irish shamrock; and the shillings John Kane's father earned came hard enough.

When anyone wanted a bit of swamp, or low land, ditched and drained, 'twas Kane that would do the job. If he had lived to be a hundred he never would have got rich at that work; but still there was a living in it.

He was only a third of the way toward being a hundred, however, when Fate shuffled the cards, and the same job which had given him a living brought him death instead.

As the kirk-yard, where the West Calder folk slept their last sleep, was a damp resting place even for those who slumber so soundly, Kane was hired to drain it. Eleven feet deep were the trenches he dug. And, working there in the wet and mire, he took cold, lingered for a year, and then was buried in that same kirk-yard. One hopes that they gave him a dry spot to lie in.

The family, which had been the "hope" of the young couple, must have been almost the despair of the widowed mother; for there were eight children in all. With that many mouths to be fed, the mother immediately began working at any jobs she could get to earn money. So did the oldest boy, who was ten; and the oldest girl, who was nine; and John himself, who was all of eight years old.

"The children were just steps and stairs," he said, indicating with an expressive gesture the range from the littlest to the biggest.

The two boys worked first in a candle factory; ten hours a day for a shilling a day. A munificent wage of a little more than two cents an hour! But it meant fifty cents a day for the family; and that enabled the thrifty mother even to put by a wee bit of money for the future.

The next year, when he was nine, John Kane went to work in the mines; getting out shale from which oil and gas were extracted.

PICK YOUR PEN POINT BY COLOR

The simplest, safest, surest way to get permanent pen satisfaction is to pick your pen point by color.

Waterman's Number Seven with its identifying color band offers the quickest, most reliable guide to pen point selection

The following colors on holders tell the story of pen point character. Look for them on Waterman's Number Seven.

Red—STANDARD—Suits most writers. A splendid correspondence point. Medium flexibility. For home and general use.

Green—RIGID—Tempered to armor-plate hardness. Will not shade even under heavy pressure. Unequaled for manifolding. The salesman's friend.

Purple—STIFF; FINE—Writes without pressure. Makes a thin, clear line and small figures with unerring accuracy. Popular with accountants.

Pink—FLEXIBLE; FINE—As resilient as a watch-spring. Fine, tapered point; ground fine to shade at any angle. Loved by stenographers.

Blue—BLUNT—An improved stub point. This point makes a broad line. May be held in any position. Liked by rapid writers.

Yellow—ROUNDED—A different pen point. The tip is ball shape. Makes a heavy, characteristic line without pressure. Suits left-handed writers.

Merchants who sell Waterman's will be glad to let you try all six points. Do this and select the one that suits you best.

When you buy a Waterman's you buy perpetual pen service.

Guaranteed since 1883 and until 1983—100 years of pen service

"For months at a stretch," he told me with a smile, "I never saw the sun! I went down into the mine before the sun was up. And it went down before I came out again."

"But didn't you go to school?" I asked.

"Not after me father died," he said. "And, before that, only a little. We started, over there, when we were very young—to get us out of the way at home, I suppose. I know I was sent to school when I was no more than four or five years old.

"But I was so young that the teacher didn't bother trying to learn me anything. All I done was to sit and draw pictures on me little slate. So long as I was let to do that, I was happy.

"One day I was sitting there, making me pictures and not even knowing that anybody was watching me, when the teacher give a sharp rap on his desk. I looked up, and there he was, crooking his finger for me to come forward. Which I did—and got six raps with a cane across me bare hand!

"When I turned to go back, there was all the children scrambling to get into their seats. Not till then did I know they'd stolen up behind me and been looking over me shoulder at the picture I was making on me slate. The teacher thought I'd done it on purpose, to break up the discipline. But I hadn't known they were there."

"So you were making pictures even then?" I asked.

"Yes, I've always been making them. When I worked in the mines I had a mile and a half to walk from me home. In summer I used to start early, take a bit of pencil and a piece of paper in me pocket, and sit down by the roadside to make pictures—until, the first thing I knew, it would be so late I had to run all the rest of the way to the mine shaft.

"At night too, when I got home from work, I'd try to draw things: copy little pictures I'd come across; or real things—though that was harder."

"Didn't people realize that you had a special gift?" I asked. "Wasn't there anyone that tried to help you?"

"Among poor folks like us? And ignorant, too!"

He shook his head.

JUST a knack at drawing pictures! It is easy to understand how useless that must have seemed to people who were absorbed, body and mind, in a struggle merely to live. So, for more than ten years, John Kane went on working in the mines.

Meanwhile, bit by bit, his mother had saved every farthing she could squeeze out of the wages she and her children earned. For she, too, had her dream! The dream which, to the poor and the downtrodden in every land, is spelled by the one word—America! When John Kane was nineteen, her dream began to come true.

First, the oldest brother was sent to the States and found work in McKeesport, Pennsylvania. The following year it was John's turn to come. That was forty years ago, when he was a young man of twenty; able and willing to work, but with little education and no knowledge of the world.

His brother got him a job in the tube works at McKeesport. From there he went to the coke furnaces at Connellsville; and after that he worked in the blast furnaces at what is now the town of Bessemer.

In its essentials, it was the same old environment of ignorance, poverty, the bare struggle to live. He worked twelve hours a day and seven days a week. He stopped even trying to make pictures. His body was too tired; his mind too starved.

But about one thing he finally began to feel a dull resentment. And when weeks had gone by, with never a Sunday when he could go to church, resentment became rebellion.

"One Saturday morning," he said to me, "when I had made up me mind that things had got to be different, I told the foreman that I'd not be on the job the next day.

"'You won't?' he says. 'Well, you'd better be!'

"With that, we had it back and forth for a while, till all of a sudden I says to him: 'What's more, I'm never going to work on a Sunday again!'

"That meant I had to quit. So I came down to Pittsburgh and got a job as a laborer; just a helper to the men that were laying stone blocks in the street paving."

THAT was his life for the next year or two. Then he moved up a peg and became one of the workmen who actually laid the blocks. He served seven years in that capacity! Seven years on his knees in the streets of Pittsburgh! And by that time he was thirty years old.

But in those seven years there did come an occasional break. Paving contracts were sometimes held up, or work was slack. Kane had to fill in these gaps with odd jobs; and because his hands instinctively itched to handle a brush, these were, as often as possible, odd jobs of painting. Not pictures! Just house painting. But at least it woke the old dream to life again; and once more he began to spend his spare time in trying to draw.

A more practical result was that it brought him his next job; this time with the Pressed Steel Car Company, as a painter of freight cars. Not much need there for artistic sense; or so I thought! But John Kane assured me that it required an eye for color and real dexterity with a brush.

At any rate, pitifully inadequate as it was, it had to serve as his only apprenticeship to Art. His first "canvases" were the ends of box cars.

"Once," he smiled, "I got caught at it; the way I got caught at school, making pictures on me slate.

"At the noon hour one day, I had finished lunch in a hurry and started to paint a picture on the end of a car. It had just the priming coat on, and I knew I wasn't doing any harm, because the picture would be painted out when I put on the finishing coats.

"The rest of the men had gathered about to watch me, when I happened to glance over me shoulder—and there was the superintendent, looking around the corner of another car! I was as scared as if I was only four years old again, and the teacher standing over me with a cane.

"But the superintendent just said: 'You ought to be painting pictures instead of freight cars, John Kane!'

Ordinary Flat Finish White Paint

Barreled Sunlight

These photographs of paint surfaces were made through a powerful microscope. The astonishing contrast shows why Barreled Sunlight is so easy to keep clean. Smooth, unbroken and non-porous, it resists dirt and washes like tile.

Seals itself against dirt!

This paint enamel is so satin-smooth it can't hold dirt embedded CLOUDS of sticky road-dust . . . Soot from coal smoke . . . Oily particles thrown out by motor exhausts . . .

Broadcast by the winds . . . Filtering indoors . . . Insidious, clinging, paint-soiling dirt. There is more of it every day!

Ordinary paint on walls and woodwork has no defense. It is soon grey with ingrained grime, impossible to remove without also removing some of the paint.

But the satin-smooth, flawless surface of Barreled Sunlight defies dirt. It has no "pores" for dirt to get into—and mere surface smudges can be quickly washed off.

Barreled Sunlight has a rich enamel finish with a depth peculiar to itself. It is easy to apply and has unusual opacity.

Guaranteed to remain white longest.

Readily tinted with oil colors. Quantities of 5 gallons or more tinted to order at the factory, without extra charge.

Made in Semi-Gloss and Flat as well as the full Gloss. Cans of all sizes, and drums. For priming, use Barreled Sunlight Undercoat. See coupon.

"Then he walked away. But I always thought—"

Kane hesitated a moment before he went on: "I wasn't sure; but I thought he treated me a little different after that."

I'm afraid I can't make you realize all the meaning that was crowded into that one sentence as he spoke it. The starved longing for understanding and appreciation. The wish to believe that someone finally had caught a gleam of the light within him. The meagerness of the "recognition" of which he was not even certain; but which he has treasured in his heart all these years.

"I thought he treated me a little different after that."

When a man cherishes so faint a half-hope as those words imply one realizes the utter darkness through which he was trying to feel his way.

Nothing came of it, however. He went on painting box cars for several years, the latter part of the time with the Standard Steel Car Company, in Butler County. Then came a business depression and the works were closed down.

This was serious; for by that time he had a wife and two children to support. To accomplish this, he went around through the coal-mine country, getting orders for crayon and pastel "enlargements" which he "worked up" himself. He received three or four dollars for a black and white "portrait," and about five dollars for one in pastel.

"I earned about as much as I'd been paid by the car company," he said. "But I had to be always traveling, and that kept me away from me family so much that I finally give it up, came back to Pittsburgh and started as a house painter. That was twenty years ago; and I've been painting houses ever since."

Painting houses—and trying to paint pictures. But it has been only during the past few years that he has been able to devote much time or effort to the latter. Even now, he can give it only his spare hours.

Don't forget that he is sixty years old! The vista of "spare hours" ahead of him is none too long, and it is steadily shortening. He realizes that he doesn't know much about painting. He used to try to get into some art school. But he found none that was free; and he couldn't afford to go and pay.

UNTIL the past year or two, he never even had spoken to a human being who knew anything about art! He never was acquainted with anyone who could even tell him what kind of materials to use. He painted on anything he could get hold of—cardboard, wood, cloth, the "composition" board sometimes used by builders for the inside walls of houses. When he began to use canvas, he did not know the technic of preparing it. He has simply experimented by himself.

Practically without schooling, he was unfamiliar with books. He did not know how to get, from books, the help they might have been to him.

I said to him: "You are like a man who, alone and in a single lifetime, is trying to learn what the painters, through the centuries, have been finding out."

He looked at me for a moment, trying to get the meaning of what I said. Then his head drooped forward.

"Yes," he muttered, "I am like that."

In a small way, "studying art" was one of the things I did years ago; and when John Kane found that I, too, cared about pictures, he was pathetically eager to "talk shop." Diffident and almost apologetic in expressing his ideas, he nevertheless had them to express. And as he put his paintings, one by one, on the easel, I began to see the answer to the question which had been in my mind all the time.

THE question was this: What does it profit a man to spend his life in struggling to be the thing he wants to be, if in the end he cannot reach his goal?

That was the question. And this is the way the answer came:

One of the paintings he placed on the easel was of a green hillside with grazing cattle and, against the sky line, scattered houses—one of them a curious red in color.

"That," said Kane, "is out at Squirrel Hill. I was painting a church there; and, one day, when I was up on the scaffolding, I looked off and I saw this bit of a valley. I marked the spot in my mind; and the first time I had a chance I went out there and walked about, to find the best point to—to make a picture of it. The cows were not there. But," he laughed, "I thought they ought to be there. So I put them in.

"And as I was walking about that day, I saw this picture," stooping to pick up another painting. "These trees"—he shook his head; "they're not right, those trees! I couldn't get them to come right, somehow."

"What's that picture up there?" I asked, pointing to one hanging on the wall.

His face lighted up, as he went over and touched it gently with his work-stained fingers.

"That," he said, "is the school and the convent of the Sisters of Saint Francis. I was going to work early one morning, and just below the hill, right here!"—pointing to the spot—"I looked up and the sun was just coming up behind the towers of the school building, atop the hill. It made a strange light over everything up there, while we were almost in darkness down in the valley. It—it was beautiful. And I thought—"

He stopped; but in his eyes I could read what he was struggling to express. To him it was a symbol; all his life he has been down in the shadows, looking up at the sunlight where there is knowledge! When I managed to say this, in some stumbling fashion, he looked half frightened at having his unspoken thought find words. But he nodded his head.

"They were painting a big billboard over on this corner," he went on, pointing to a place outside the picture; "and before going on to me work, I climbed all over the scaffolding, getting the scene from different angles, to see which would be best.

He turned to me to see whether, once more, I could understand the implications he wanted to convey in his halting phrases. But this time I only nodded. I felt as if I had been playing a curious game of "Hunt the Thimble," and was about to put my hand on it.

Turning back to the picture on the easel, I pointed to the first one, and said: "You were painting a church when you discovered this scene, weren't you?"

"Yes," he replied.

"There were other workmen on the same job?"

He nodded.

"But they did not see the little valley. Not to be conscious of it, at any rate."

He turned intent eyes toward me. . . . "No," he said slowly; "they did not see it."

"And the morning when you were going to work," I went on, looking at the picture on the wall. "On the same street, at the same time, there were many others going to their work also?"

"Very many," he said.

"But among them all, perhaps you were the only one that looked up and saw the towers of the school, with the rising sun making a strange light about it?"

He stared at me in silence; but in his own eyes I saw the coming of "a strange light" there, too.

"On the streets and in the cars," I said, "perhaps you are always looking at the faces of the people around you. And to you they are fascinating, in form and in meaning. But the people beside you don't see what you do."

He shook his head.

"The whole everyday world," I said, "is a different place to you, because your attempt to 'make pictures' has really opened your eyes to things which otherwise you never would have seen. Is that true?"

"Yes," he said, and drew a deep breath of satisfaction.

"Then does it all come to this?" I asked. "Even though you may never paint fine pictures, even though as an artist you may be a failure, the struggle will have been worth while, because of what it has done for yourself. In reaching after the thing you wanted to grasp, you have at least captured something! And it is something you would not have had, if you had not striven at all."

HE DID not answer me. The trains rumbled and shrieked in the darkness outside, while we stood there in silence. John Kane was not looking at his pictures now. He was busy with his thoughts. And finally he lifted his head, turned to me—and smiled. That was all. But he seemed like a man who, after being parched with thirst, has taken a deep draft of cool, clear water. Or, perhaps, like one who, after bewildered wandering in a labyrinth, touches the thread which will show him his way.

At last he said slowly: "Yes—maybe that's all I'll get out of it—but it's enough to make it worth while."

"HOW I Lost Money Trying to Get Rich" vividly relates, next month, the experiences of a man—a supposedly hard-headed business man, too—who tried to beat the game by getting rich overnight. In exposing his financial folly, as he does in this article, he is actuated by a genuine desire to prevent other people from collecting a beautiful bunch of worthless certificates. His recipe for safe and sane investment is given at the end of the article.

Sore throat's easiest victims—reducing women!

Neglecting a cold or sore throat is dangerous business for anyone—doubly dangerous for reducing women weakened by strenuous exercises and "canary bird" diets.

For both colds and sore throats often lead to serious complications if not treated immediately.

Look upon throat irritation as a warning, and at the first sign of it gargle repeatedly with Listerine, the safe antiseptic, used full strength.

If rapid improvement is not apparent, consult your physician.

Time and time again, however, Listerine has checked colds and sore throats before they had a chance to become serious.

Certainly, this pleasant precaution is worth taking during winter and early spring weather when grippe, "flu," and pneumonia are a constant threat. Lambert Pharmacal Co., St. Louis, Mo., U. S. A.

have their beginning or development in the THROAT and nose. Some of mild character, yield to an antiseptic. Others, more serious, do not. At the first sign of an irritated throat, gargle frequently with Listerine, and if no improvement is shown, consult a physician.

GEORGE H. MOSS says:

"Any Store Can Be a Big-Town Store"

GEORGE H. MOSS, President of the Raleigh Hardware Co., of Beckley, West Virginia, is a merchant—and a most unusual one.

FARM & FIRESIDE first heard of him a few weeks ago when it was noised about that his store had sold $262,000 worth of washing machines during 1927.

That's a sales record on a specialty line that many a big-town store might envy.

However, his store is not a big-town store—that is, in the sense that it is located in a large city. For the population of Beckley is only about 8,000.

But it is a big-town store in point of sales volume.

For when the store closed its books on the last day of last year, its sales of hardware and specialty goods for 12 months totaled up approximately $700,000.

And that is big-time merchandising.

He tells FARM & FIRESIDE

FARM & FIRESIDE went out to see Mr. Moss to get the secret of his success as a small-city merchant. And here are some of the high spots secured in that interview:

"The size of the town your store's located in has less to do with your sales volume than you'd think," says Mr. Moss. And then he added—"Any store in a small town can be a big-town store if it goes about it right."

What does he mean when he says—"if it goes about it right"?

But this is only one of the questions he answers in his interview with FARM & FIRESIDE—which is now published in folder form and available to any dealer who asks for it.

He tells FARM & FIRESIDE how he built a $700,000 hardware and specialty business in an 8,000 town

Send the Coupon

For instance—have you thought of how you can benefit your sales by building a new store? Or by rearranging your present store?

Mr. Moss has been through all this. And he gives you his experience.

Should you attempt a large house-to-house selling plan?

He has a crew of 16 to 25 outside men working for him all the time—taking his store into the customer's home. And he tells about some of the problems you run up against when you go into this kind of selling on a big scale.

Are you carrying out any definite program for widening your trading area?

Here he lets you in on the secret of how he has made his store the buying center of three prosperous counties—with a trading population of 125,000.

And are you interested in knowing how many turnovers he makes a year on his $200,000 stock? How he keeps his investment in slow-moving stock cut right down to minimum? Why he handles nationally advertised goods almost exclusively? And how he is going out strong after a bigger volume of farm trade this year?

Send the coupon—get this story of an outstanding small-city merchandising success.

FARM & FIRESIDE'S Service to Small-City Retailers

This is another interview in FARM & FIRESIDE'S series—which makes available to retailers the tried and proven methods for building farm trade, as used by outstandingly successful merchants.

And this work is just a part of the service FARM & FIRESIDE renders in meeting the obligations of leadership in the farm field.

As every dealer knows, the advertisements in this magazine are a real force in influencing more than 1,200,000 farm families to buy. And a glance through any issue immediately shows why this is so—for here is a hundred-per-cent-personal magazine—edited straight to the individual—and read with warmer interest than any other farm publication.

That's why dealers are finding it so profitable to feature and push products advertised in FARM & FIRESIDE—and why manufacturers' advertising in this magazine shows such steady growth.

This Road is Closed

usual street and then, at the next corner, came to three wooden hurdles set in his path.

"This road is closed for repairs"

It exasperated him. For months he had gone home along that street; it was the shortest way for him. And he was tired.

"What repairs?" he demanded aloud. For the road, little more than a narrow lane, lay quite empty and tranquil between the high privet hedges that bordered it.

"I'm sure I can't imagine," a voice answered, and, turning, he saw that girl who lived at the end of his street. He had seen her twice a day for hundreds of days; but he didn't know her. A nice sort of girl, he thought her, slender and pretty, with serious eyes and a distinguished air; a little like the Enid who had vanished now beneath gingham aprons.

"No reason that I can see why pedestrians shouldn't use it," he said. "Shall we?" He had taken off his hat, and was smiling at her, and she thought it a nice smile, something like Jack Griffith's, only more clever and not so candid. "After all, these hurdles are nothing but a moral barrier. We can pass them easily enough."

"I don't know," she said, thoughtfully. "Somehow, when I saw that sign, it gave me a shock. 'This Road is Closed' . . . I've been coming along here for years and years—and now, perhaps it's time to try a new road."

"A new road," Buller repeated, staring at her with a faint frown.

The sun was gone now, and in the dusk her face was strange to him. It seemed pale, her eyes wide and steady. And her voice had in it some quality that thrilled him.

"It has to happen," she said. "Suddenly the old road, the familiar one, is closed, and we have to go a new way." She stopped, amazed to find herself speaking so to a stranger. Yet, in a way, it all seemed perfectly natural, almost as if she had known it would be so.

"But we can still use the old road!" cried Buller, with a curious vehemence. For he didn't want to try a new road. He was—was he afraid?

"BETTER not!" said a deep voice behind him, and both he and Jess looked 'round, to see Mr. Griffith. He was a little out of breath, for he was not accustomed to walking these past ten years. But his doctor had told him that walk he must, and he had begun this evening, and had hurried after Miss Rivers and Buller, because they lived on his street and would know the best way.

"Of course!" thought Buller. "He has a profound respect for signs. Because he's the kind who puts up signs in this world. He's one of the 'No Trespassing,' 'No Smoking,' 'No Admittance' kind. He owns things. And I'm one of the solitary freebooters roaming through his world, always hungry. I don't obey signs."

And he pushed one of the hurdles aside,

Try 10 cigars free!

Send no money - just mail the coupon

NO matter what you smoke now, no matter whether you have ever ordered cigars by mail—now is your chance to try absolutely free a box of full-flavored, cool, even-burning cigars—the kind that more and more smokers every day say they've "hunted years for."

This is "my treat"

Sign and mail the coupon now. I'll personally see that you get a box of freshly made, full-flavored cigars, size and shape as in the illustration, postage prepaid.

My famous Panatela, the cigar illustrated, is a full five-inch cigar. The genuine Cuban-grown, clear Havana filler gives it richness and rare flavor. The fine Sumatra leaf wrapper assures even burning and long white ash. This cigar is just heavy enough to satisfy, yet light enough to please smokers accustomed to cigarettes. Strictly hand-made by skilled adults in clean, airy surroundings.

You save jobber and dealer profits

For twenty-four years I have been selling cigars by the box, direct and fresh, at a price that represents only one cost of handling and one profit. Customers tell me that I save them upwards of 5 cents on each cigar.

My selling policy is simple. I make the best cigars I know how, put a box in a customer's hands, ask him to smoke ten. If he likes them, he pays. If he doesn't like them, he returns the remainder of the box at my expense. The trial costs him nothing.

Why I lose money on the first box

I don't expect to make a penny on the first box of cigars sent to a new customer. In fact, I lose money—and am willing to.

Suppose, for instance, you and 599 other men order a box of cigars from this advertisement. Dividing 600 into $3,400 (the cost of this advertisement) gives $5.67. In other words, it costs me $5.67 to induce you to try a box of 50 cigars. So I must offer an extraordinary cigar; it must be better than you expect. The flavor, aroma, cool, even-burning qualities must delight you. Otherwise you would not order again. And I would lose more and more money on every advertisement.

Snap up this offer quick!

Let me send you a box of 50 cigars at once. If, after you smoke ten, the box doesn't seem worth $3.75, return the forty unsmoked cigars within ten days—no explanation necessary, no questions asked. You will not be obligated in any way. In ordering please use your business letterhead or the coupon, filling in the line marked "Reference." Or, if you don't wish to bother giving a reference, just drop me a postcard and you can pay the postman $3.75 when the cigars are delivered. I'll pay the postage.

Order today—enjoy the cigars right away

As I said before, you take no risk. The cigars won't cost you a penny if you don't like them. Now is your chance to try a wonderful cigar free. Mail the coupon to me.

NELSON B. SHIVERS, Pres.

Actual Size and Shape

This coupon entitles you to a FREE TRIAL of my cigars.

HERBERT D. SHIVERS, Inc.
30 Bank Street, Philadelphia, Pa

Please send me a box of 50 Panatela cigars. If, after smoking 10, I decide the box is worth $3.75, I agree to send you that amount. If I decide it isn't worth that amount, I agree to return the 40 unsmoked cigars within ten days with no obligation.

Scientists discover health-giving power in simple Japan Tea

FOR those who suffer from "rheumatic" pains—

For those who have a sallow complexion—

For those who are "run down" and easily tired out—

For many of us—there is deep interest in the recent startling discoveries about Japan tea. Scientists have found in it an invaluable food element, a wonderful, health-giving property.

It is now believed that countless men and women may be missing the joys of perfect health just because their three meals a day give them too little of this all-important food element—Vitamin C.

"Observations during the World War," writes one of the country's foremost scientists, "and my recollection of specific cases, all combine to suggest that much of the so-called rheumatism which afflicts such a large part of our people is due, at least in large part, to the use of a diet too poor in Vitamin C. The symptoms are a sallow, muddy complexion, loss of energy, fleeting pains in the joints and limbs, usually mistaken for rheumatism."

Science has now found a rich source of health-giving Vitamin C in the leaves of simple Japan green tea

A rich source of this precious element

Only a small number of foods, aside from Japan green tea—spinach and a few fruits and vegetables—contain this wonderful food element.

The amazing fact today established by science is the richness in this precious Vitamin C, of our old favorite drink, Japan green tea.

For that "tired feeling" which takes the pleasure out of life, for those so-called "rheumatic" twinges that spoil many a day, for the sallow skin you hate to see in the mirror, try this simple thing. Drink fragrant cups of Japan green tea regularly at lunch, at supper, in the afternoon. Take advantage of their rich supply of the precious food element, Vitamin C. It is probable that they will build new vitality for you—that you will both feel and look more vigorous after a few weeks. Begin today drinking Japan green tea. American-Japanese Tea Committee, 782 Wrigley Bldg., Chicago.

and smiled, a smile which looked a trifle fierce in the twilight.

But Jess Rivers was neither a sober, sign-fearing citizen like Mr. Griffith, nor an impatient young rebel like Buller. She was a woman, and a young one, and she looked upon life as an entirely personal adventure. She simply felt what she ought to do.

"Let's go a new way!" she said.

Her fresh young voice, coming through the dusk, startled both the men.

"Certainly!" said Griffith gallantly, and as he turned to follow her, so did Buller. He did not want to, but he did.

IT WAS an incredible scene. They stopped short, all three of them, and stared in wonder. They had come by ways strange to them, down a mean street that ran past the rear of small shops and disorderly back yards, they had turned another corner—and stood now upon the threshold of a fairyland.

It was a short street, lined with little houses, their windows lit. And down the center hung a row of yellow lanterns, like fantastic moons against the dusky violet of the sky. And music was playing, a minuet of Chopin's, a gay and fragile air. Yet, in this street lit by lanterns and haunted by music, not a soul was to be seen; it was deserted in its elfin festivity.

"But . . . how strange!" cried Jess. "How lovely!"

Buller, who had ranged so largely about the world, understood the meaning of the scene; but when he looked at the girl's face, he forebore to speak. Let her have her moment of wonder, this girl who was a little like what Enid had been.

Mr. Griffith, however, had been for a long time a lonely man; he had almost forgotten what comradeship was, and remembered only the fatherly duty of explaining everything.

"I believe," he said, "it's what they call a 'block party.' Yes! There's a sign! 'The James Ponelli Association—Block Party—Dancing. Gents 25c. Extra Ladies 10c. All are Welcome.' Yes. . . . Of course it's too early yet. . . . And the music—that's a radio, in that little barber shop."

But he could not destroy the enchantment.

"It's lovely!" she said slowly. And it was, with the lanterns swinging in the windy May night and that delicate music floating out.

"Entirely proletarian," observed Buller, with a side glance at Griffith, the rich man, the plutocrat, oppressor of the poor.

Only, just at that moment Griffith did not look like a plutocrat. He looked like nothing in the world but a gray-haired, middle-aged man with a kindly face and rather innocent eyes.

"Come on!" said Buller impatiently, annoyed with himself for the sympathy that was growing upon him for this fellow.

So they went forward; they crossed the threshold of that tawdry fairyland. And the destined thing happened:

The door of one of the little houses opened, and a man came out, ran down the steps and approached Griffith.

"Come right in, sir," he said.

The light was shining on his face, and it was a desperate young face, pallid and strained, with hollow blue eyes, and a crest of fair hair above his forehead.

"What's the trouble?" asked Griffith, in a matter-of-fact tone.

"She—it was an accident, sir," said the man. "She—fell—hurt her head. She—I don't want her to go to the hospital. . . . I was laid off two weeks ago, but I'll get a job pretty soon. An' if you'll leave me pay you sump'in every week—" He turned to Jess. "I don't think she'll need no nurse, lady," he said anxiously. "She's got her mother there."

"I'm afraid you've made a mistake," said Griffith, in the same matter-of-fact tone. "I'm not the doctor."

"Maybe we can do something though," said Jess quickly. "Can I help?"

The man stared at her.

"I guess not," he said, slowly. "She's got her mother in there." He stopped. "Lord!" he cried, "but she's no good! . . . The way she carried on. Can't even leave her while I go after the doctor. It—it—" His voice broke. "Makes me sick!"

"I'll stay while you get a doctor," said Jess.

"No!" whispered Buller. "You can't. Don't be silly!"

"I wouldn't be long," said the man eagerly. "She on'y needs someone with sense, just to sit there—"

"No!" said Buller, aloud. "This young lady can't—"

"Oh, yes, I can!" said Jess. "I'd be glad to. In here?"

The man made no attempt to thank her.

"Aw' right!" he said. "This way." But the relief in his haggard face was enough for Jess. She turned to follow him into the house. Buller caught her arm.

"See here!" he said, very low, "you don't realize. . . . This may be a police-court case, this 'accident.' You don't know these people. I do. Keep out of this!"

"No," said Griffith unexpectedly. "No. . . . Don't worry, Buller. I'll go with Miss Rivers. Can't simply pass by, eh? I mean—don't worry. I'll stay too."

The young man was in the doorway, waiting, and Jess and Griffith went toward him. And Buller followed them.

"Darn folly!" he muttered. "There's going to be trouble. . . ."

JESS RIVERS had never before been in a house like this, such a sorry little house, so poor and dim and dirty. A flickering gas-jet lighted a hall where the paper was curling off the walls, and in the air hung a depressing taint of burnt food, of dust, of dirt, of stale tobacco, of disinfectant. At the end of the passage, the man opened a door and went in, and Jess after him.

On the bed lay a girl, with a bandage 'round her head, a forlorn and disheveled little thing, but lovely in a dark, delicate way, and with a sort of valiant neatness and style to her cheap dress. Sitting on the foot of the bed was an old woman, a wild little witch of a creature, with gray hair all in disorder, a wizened brown face, and black eyes bright with terror.

"Dottore!" she cried, "you come! You see! He keel! He verra bad man! Mia figlia she verra seeck. You maka well. He ess bad—bad—"

"Shut up, Mommer!" said the girl faintly. "Don't pay no attention to her, mister. It was an accident."

The man was standing, leaning against the wall at the other side of the room. The girl turned her dark eyes toward him; they looked at each other—the strangest look, hard, bitter, yet filled with a secret understanding.

And only Griffith understood that look.

"You see what you've done!" That was what he read in the girl's glance. "All right! It's worse for you than for me, a thousand times. You're sick with shame and misery, and I'm glad. I'm glad! And yet I'm so sorry for you—so sorry, my heart is fit to break. Because I love you so!"

And he thought that in the man's hollow blue eyes he could read this:

"All right! You've won. You've conquered me. I've hurt you. I didn't mean to; but just for that moment I hated you. Perhaps I hate you now. But I love you. And I don't understand my love. It is a torment to me. I hated you for that moment—but I would die for you now. I'd give my life to spare you this, you that I hate and love and never understand!"

Mr. Griffith, the plutocrat, understood.

"It's real!" he was thinking.

AND his own life wasn't real any more, had not been for years and years. Not since his wife died. The anguish of his loss had been the last of the real things. After that, there had been only shadows, vexations, regrets, faint and transient things, nothing stirring and vital, nothing real, as this scene was real.

He remembered. It shocked him to remember, but he could not help it.

"Helen was a saint!" he said to himself, vehemently. "A saint!"

But he could not help remembering. She hadn't been a saint, that day so many years ago. No! She had been furious, called him a 'beast,' said she was going to leave him, even started out of the house. He had utterly forgotten what the quarrel was about; he remembered only her blazing anger and his own bitterness. And their dismay, their grief afterward, that they should so have hurt each other. She had cried in his arms, and he had tried to comfort her, and begged her to forgive him, if she could. Such a long time ago, and so many years of faithful love had followed it. . . .

"We were both very young," he thought. "My dear girl, my Helen. . . . Both of us very young. And it never happened again. Helen, my dear—my dear."

Then he thought of his daughter.

"Nina," he thought. "Without her mother . . . such a good girl. . . . I haven't realized. I've expected too much. I've been hard. . . . That coat! Lord forgive me! I told her I was disappointed in her. . . . That boy of mine. . . . Good children both of them. Helen's children."

His eyes turned to Miss Rivers, bending over the bed.

"My boy," he thought. "He was beginning to care for her—and I tried to stop him. Told him he was no good. But—but he's young! Why didn't I remember that? He's young. It's his time for love. . . . And what's his crime, after all? He spends a little too much money. Lord forgive me, what does that amount to? He works hard. He'll settle down before long. He's young, and I'm old. Why shouldn't I help him? Let him marry now. She's a good, sweet girl. . . . My children. . . . I kick about their bills. Suppose I couldn't help 'em? Suppose it had to be like this, for them?"

Suppose it was his daughter lying here in this squalid room, in want, in pain, facing the hardest realities of life with the pitiful wisdom of youth. Suppose that were his son, worn by crushing responsibilities, ill-equipped, untrained?

A sort of panic seized him. He wanted to dash out of this house and go home to Nina and Jack, wanted, longed, for the sight of their cheerful young faces; wanted to see them in the safety he had won for their youth. They would have their black hours to face, their troubles, their bewilderments; everyone did. But, thank God, he had been able to give them their chance to develop in safety, to grow strong and wholesome. And happy.

Again he looked at Jess Rivers.

"A fine girl," he thought. "What was it she had said? What was it?"

He frowned, struggling to remember something. "This Road is Closed." Was that it? The old, the familiar road closed?

Suppose he couldn't ever go back?

Suppose something had happened, so that he couldn't go back to Nina and Jack, couldn't help them any more, never had a chance to revoke what he had said that morning? A "disappointment." . . .

Jess saw Mr. Griffith go out of the room with the man; she saw them stop in the dim hall, saw Griffith speaking, and the younger man's face light with a new hope.

"He's a darling old thing!" she thought.

The old woman was leaning forward and talking to her in a passionate whisper.

"Verra bad man! Alla time he no like! No lika eat! Alla time say no good—"

"Oh, Mommer, fer Pete's sake!" said the girl wearily. "Joe's aw' right," she explained to Jess. "On'y him an' Mommer don't get on so good. Mommer's Eyetalian, an' Joe, he's Amurrican. He don't like what she cooks an' all." She closed her eyes for a moment. "An' he don't like it all so kinda dirty. On'y, I go out to work, an' I can't—Mommer's aw' right. She's bin awful good to me."

Tears were running from her closed lids; she set her lips grimly. And Jess Rivers understood.

SHE knew how it was with this girl. She loved her man; but she loved the poor old woman too.

"And it hurts her horribly," thought Jess. "This dirt and squalor. She's American; she's at home here. But her mother never can be. She's foreign. . . . The husband can't understand. Think how it must hurt!"

Suppose it were her mother, living in the house of a stranger, every weakness, every smallest, most pitiful failing exposed to hostile eyes? She glanced at the old woman, and in that wizened face she had her first glimpse of the tragedy of the old. To be old; to long to help, and to find that help undesired; to be confused and weary and lonely. . . .

"Mother!" she thought, with a stab of pain. "I've thought it was hard for me when she's lost things and forgotten things. But what must it be for her? I'm always talking about 'taking care' of her; and what she wants is to take care of me. That was her whole life for years and years. She was the strong one, the indispensable one—and I've tried to take all that away from her. . . . Oh, my poor little mother! It's late. She'll be so worried. I'm all she has. Suppose something had happened to me, and I never could get back to her? I want to tell her. . . . I want Mother!"

"He just gimme a kinda shove," the girl was saying. "He didn't mean no harm. He was mad, said he was goin' to quit, an' I grabbed a-holt on him, an' he jest tried to get away, like—an' I fell. He didn't mean to hurt me."

"NO," thought Buller; "we never do, do we?"

He had not said one word. He stood in a corner of the room, his arms folded, and he had been looking on steadily.

"This is a home," he thought, "where no one bothers too much about domestic details. This ought to suit me!"

His restless glance once more circled the room, noting the dirt, the discomfort, the ugliness.

"Enid in a gingham apron," he thought. "The decency, the honor, there is in cleanliness. . . . I wanted to—to wallow. I talked about my precious mind, that mustn't be bothered by shelves and casseroles and clean linen and so on. Enid—poor little angel I've entertained unawares—I told her the house was 'vile.'"

He almost groaned.

"I've spoiled everything! The 'first real home she's ever had.' . . . I didn't understand, because I didn't want to. It's her profound and beautiful instinct to want a home. She was willing enough to work, poor plucky little kid, but she wanted her home. And what is it, anyhow? A wretched little jerry-built house, full of instalment-plan furniture. . . . And she doesn't realize what a precarious lease she has, even on that."

A sort of horror came over him; the sweat broke out on his forehead from his great fear.

"Nothing but me, and my two hands, and whatever wits I have. Nothing but me between my girl and the world. If I fail her—she'll have to turn out again—get a job—lose that home. Nobody—nothing but me! I'm not big enough for that!"

There came to him a vision of Enid on a rainy day, a year ago. He had met her for dinner at a little table d'hôte: he remembered so well how thin and tired she had looked, for all her jolly smile. And how angry he had been because her feet were wet.

"You ought to have sense enough to wear rubbers!" he had said. But he had been thinking that she shouldn't be obliged to go out at all, in such weather, that she ought to be safe in a home of her own. Suppose she had to go out again now, in rain and wind and snow, earning her bread, shabby and tired?

"If anything happened to me—" he thought. "Well, by heaven, it sha'n't! I won't let anything happen! I will take care of her! She'll keep her home!"

Again he looked about the miserable room in which he stood.

"I'm homesick!" he said to himself, with a blank little smile.

"Here's the doctor," said Mr. Griffith briskly. "We brought him in my car. And I thought we'd all go back in it, eh? Soon as we hear the opinion."

Jess and Buller joined him in the hall to wait for the doctor's report.

"Who's that?" asked Buller, looking

The People vs. Caffein

22,152* witnesses say . . .

"My nervousness vanished when I changed to Postum!"

NONE of these 22,152 men and women was seriously ill. Yet all were below their best, mentally and physically. Something was getting on their nerves—literally. Something that made them cross and irritable at home and at work. Something that cut down their efficiency, and cost them friends.

One by one, they decided to try a simple change in diet. They eliminated caffein from their diet for thirty days—and drank Postum instead. Before the thirty days were up, every one of the 22,152 was convinced! Nervousness had vanished. They slept better—ate better—felt worlds better! They became regular Postum users.

Make This Test!

Perhaps you, too, suffer from restless nights, and worried, harassed days. Perhaps you, too, find yourself fretful and short-tempered—annoyed by trifles you used to laugh at.

You may never have thought to blame caffein, the seemingly harmless stimulant you take with your meals. But make the test these others made—and see! Let Postum be your mealtime drink for thirty days. Then judge!

You'll miss nothing in enjoyment! For Postum is a delightful drink in its own right—with a full-bodied, distinctive flavor millions prefer to that of any other. Postum is made of whole wheat and bran, roasted—no trace of any artificial stimulant in it. A drink that never keeps you awake, never frays your nerves, or causes headaches and indigestion, as caffein often does.

Carrie Blanchard, the famous food demonstrator, will help you start your 30-day test of Postum.

Carrie Blanchard's offer

"Let me send you, free, one week's supply of Postum, with my personal directions for preparing it, as a start on the 30-day test.

"Or if you would rather begin the test today, get Postum at your grocer's. It costs much less than most other mealtime drinks—only one-half cent a cup.

"Please indicate on the coupon whether you prefer Instant Postum, made instantly in the cup, or Postum Cereal, the kind you boil."

A modern watch deserves a chain in character

PERHAPS the chain you are wearing now was given to you. Or perhaps you picked it at random, with no thought of the watch to which it would be attached. . . . Whatever the design of your watch, there is a Simmons Chain that will seem to you expressly made for it. . . . A new chain costs very little.

Simmons Chains, made of seamless gold-filled wire, manufactured under our own patents in our own factory, may be obtained in natural gold, green gold or white gold. Priced from $4 to $15. The chain shown here is a Waldemar, No. 29587. Price, $11.25. Your jeweler will be glad to show you his complete assortment. R. F. Simmons Company, Attleboro, Mass.

toward the corner where Jess stood talking to some other man.

"My son," said Griffith. "He drove the car. A good boy. A—good—boy."

His voice trailed away, his glance grew absent. Two young people, at the very beginning of things. . . . And in that squalid room, two other young people who had begun so cruelly handicapped.

"I'll help 'em!" he thought. "All four of 'em. Why not, eh? I ought to, I've had the best there is in life. Helen—the best."

"You know," said young Griffith to Jess, "when I saw you there, by that girl, I—I couldn't tell you how you looked!"

"I wasn't doing the least bit of good," said Jess reluctantly. "It may have been decorative, but it certainly wasn't useful."

"You don't know," said he. "It might do . . . someone any amount of good if you . . . if you were just there."

The doctor came out.

"Nothing serious," he said. "Rest and care," and he gave his directions to Mr. Griffith.

"I've sent for a nurse," said Griffith. "And now, home, eh? Chez-vous—that's what the French say?"

So they went. And it seemed to them that the old, the familiar road was not closed to them. They thought that nothing had happened, that they could take up again the same lives. On their street were the three lighted houses, waiting.

But they were wrong. Something had happened. They had seen; each of them had taken one step along a new road.

Do You Believe in Luck? I Do

floor. He put the certificates in his box and forgot them. One day he boarded the train in Syracuse for New York, and found himself in the smoking car beside his banker friend.

"Do you still have your stock in the Smith Company?" asked the banker.

The manufacturer said he had.

"I suppose you know that the common is selling for three hundred and fifty dollars a share?"

"Three hundred and fifty a share!" exclaimed the manufacturer incredulously. "You mean that I have a profit of thirty-five thousand dollars?"

"Exactly."

"I'm going to sell it as soon as I get off the train."

"Not so fast," the banker advised. "It's going to be worth a lot more than thirty-five thousand dollars."

But the manufacturer said that he was not piggish. Thirty-five thousand was more than he had ever expected to make without working for it, in his whole life.

The banker, seeing that he could not be persuaded, said: "All right, I'll buy your stock myself." The deal was closed.

PRESENTLY the manufacturer resumed the conversation by asking, "What new ground-floor propos'tion are you fellows working on now?"

"We're about to bring out the Jones Automobile Company," the banker said. "And we think it will go very much bigger."

To make a long story short, before the manufacturer reached New York he had agreed to invest the thirty-five thousand dollars from the sale of his Smith stock in the new Jones stock. Both were promoted by the same interests. The Jones stock would seem to be better, since the crowd had already gained its experience in the Smith company. The advice was equally friendly in each instance and came directly from "the inside." Yet the Smith stock, if the manufacturer had held it, would be worth more than half a million dollars to-day. And the Jones stock went to zero, and was called upon to pay assessment. And all because the manufacturer happened on that day to take that particular train; and met his good friend the banker.

Such "happenstance" incidents are no small part of the fascination of the game of business. One never knows, when he enters an elevator or tears open an envelope or picks up the telephone, what new trick of fortune may be about to be played. Every day is a new series of adventures; around the next corner may lie the event that will change a whole career.

THE Editor and I were talking about it at luncheon one day.

"It would be easy to be superstitious," he said. "Take my own case for an example. I was working on a New York newspaper. One day I ran across a good little human-interest story. I wrote it and put it into an envelope and addressed it to THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE. I had never sent the magazine anything before; I knew no one connected with its editorial staff.

"By what piece of fortune was it that my little manuscript happened to arrive at the very time when the editors were discussing their need of a newspaper man who could do some special articles? My stofy was laid on the desk in the very midst of the discussion. They sent for me, and hired me, and here I still am."

It was quite a long speech for him to make, his habit being not to talk about himself but to encourage his contributors to talk. So he added immediately:

"How about yourself? Did you get into advertising because you planned it? Or was it an accident with you?"

"Accident," I answered truthfully. "The two principal decisions in my business life hung on very tiny threads of circumstances."

"That's a good start," said the Editor. "Go ahead and tell the story."

The story begins on the Sunday preceding Commencement Day of the year in which I got my diploma from Amherst College.

My plans for the future were all made. I had always been fond of history, and one evening, about a year before, the warm-hearted old professor who was head of the history department had asked me to call on him at his home. After beating around the bush in his genial fashion, he had said: "I want to talk to you about

How to tell if you want a new watch

Maybe you want a new watch and don't know that you do. Here is a way to tell.

Does the sight of a beautiful new watch in a jeweler's window attract you—stop you—fascinate you?

Do you instinctively pause to look at it?

Do you glance to see if the price is displayed before you move on?

If so, you have a deep, unconscious want for a new watch, and either you or your family should do something about it right away.

For remember this: No man ever did buy a beautiful and accurate watch, and then regretted it. No man—no woman—was ever heard to say: "What a fool I was to buy so accurate a watch as a Hamilton!"

You really do want a new watch.

So next time, go a step farther than window-shopping. Go inside.

Your jeweler can show you the Hamilton Watch in many models—strap or pocket, for men or women, in cases of filled gold, solid gold and platinum—at prices that range from $48 to $685.

Two booklets, "The Timekeeper" and "The Care of Your Watch," will be mailed on request. Address Hamilton Watch Company, 883 Columbia Avenue, Lancaster, Pennsylvania.

Top . . . . Man's Strap Model, The "Square." A shape in increasing vogue—especially among men who appreciate that rare combination of accuracy and smart appearance in their strap watches. In filled gold or 14k engraved, $57 and $87. Also at $55 and $85 in plain cases.

Center . . . . Man's Strap Model, The "Oval." Quite smart, quite new, quite sturdy is the new Hamilton "Oval" strap model in either filled or 14k green or white gold. Fitted with the exceptionally accurate Hamilton strap watch movement. Plain at $55 and $85; engraved at $57 and $87.

Below . . . . The Brunswick Model. Designed with an eye to tomorrow—but not at all ornate. 14k green or white gold engraved, with dial shown, $112 to $172. Other Hamilton Models at $48 upwards.

the teaching of history as your life work," and proceeded to paint the joys and satisfactions of a teacher's life. I left the old professor's house with the fixed idea that I was soon to begin my career as an instructor of history.

In this satisfied and contented frame of mind I was stretched out on the lawn of the fraternity house, with half a dozen other men, that beautiful Sunday afternoon.

People were circulating around—parents, sweethearts, alumni of all ages—but we were lordly seniors, and gave them little attention. Presently, however, I noted a curious figure, a rather short man of more than middle years, with graying hair and a considerable stomach. His suit was decidedly old; his straw hat was yellow and broken about the brim; a cheap little necktie flapped against his faded shirt. He carried a rough cane, and seemed to have a slight impediment in his walk. All in all, he was not an impressive figure. I felt a momentary pity for him, as I lay there, cloaked in the senior's complacent self-assurance.

I said to myself: "Here is a poor old alumnus who has saved his pennies for many years in order to make the trip back to the reunion. If I don't speak to him, nobody else will, and he will go home to his wife and tell her that the spirit of the fraternity isn't what it used to be, that the undergraduates are self-centered and snobbish, and that he didn't have a good time."

So I got up and met him as he reached the steps.

"Good afternoon," he puffed. "I am a very unworthy member of this fraternity. My name is Curtis, of the Hudson Chapter."

To myself I said: "You certainly are an unworthy member. If a college education doesn't enable a man to get a better suit of clothes than yours, after a quarter of a century of work, there must be something the matter." But outwardly I was very cordial. I invited him to come into the house and be at home and sign his name in the guest book.

Looking over his shoulder as he wrote, I saw:

"William E. Curtis, Washington, D. C."

I gasped.

"You aren't the William E. Curtis, are you?" I asked. "The man who writes every day in the Chicago 'Record Herald'?"

HE acknowledged it, with a little show of pleasure, and immediately I thanked my lucky stars that I had not let external appearances keep me from being decent. For, as many readers will remember, William E. Curtis was the greatest newspaper correspondent of his day. For years, his articles appeared every morning in the left-hand column of the front page of the "Record Herald." His contract with the paper gave him a large salary, generous traveling expenses, a man secretary, plus the freest-roving commission that any correspondent ever had. He could go anywhere in the whole wide world, as long as he wrote to the paper every day and told where he was and what he was seeing. Thus he had traveled in every country, and was the personal friend of kings, emperors, and prime ministers. Roosevelt regarded him as a trusted adviser, and on more than one important occasion was led to alter a state policy because of his counsel. To hundreds of thousands of people in the Middle West his daily article was the most important thing in the morning, next to breakfast.

I asked him what he was doing in Amherst, and he said that he had decided to visit the New England colleges at Commencement time, and write about them to the folks back home.

For the next two or three days I saw him frequently, and he asked me to contribute a few hundred words to one of his articles as an interview from a student on the subject of college fraternities. When the interview reached the desk of the editor in Chicago he noticed that I was a Chicago boy, and so he dug up a photograph of me and ran it in connection with the interview. On the day it appeared, a certain magazine publisher was riding in to Chicago from his country home in Lake Geneva. He saw the picture and read the rather kindly caption under it, and wrote me a letter inviting me to call on him. Some weeks later I made the call.

"What are you going to do?" he asked.

I told him I was going to take some graduate work and prepare myself to teach history. He argued that I was making a mistake, that I ought to have a year of business experience first.

THE upshot was that I agreed to try it for a year. At the end of that time I was so happily immersed in the publishing business—certainly one of the most exciting in the world—that the college campus had entirely faded from the picture.

So it happened that I became a writer instead of a college professor. Why? Because I happened to be lying under a tree in front of a fraternity house on a certain afternoon when a badly dressed stranger came up the walk. Because of all the men who were stretched out there I happened to be the one who got up and spoke to him. Because a magazine publisher, riding in from his summer home, happened to read the "Record Herald" that morning instead of the "Tribune."

Many years later I was riding on a train between New Orleans and Atlanta with George W. Perkins and John R. Mott. We were making a swing around the country, setting up the organization which was to collect the largest sum of money ever given by any nation as a free-will offering—the giant war-work fund for the support of the Y. M. C. A., the Knights of Columbus, the Salvation Army, and the four other war-work agencies. Part of the plan was to be a campaign by the boys of the country, to whose efforts we looked for several million dollars. The man who was responsible for this part of the organization came up and sat down beside me in the train.

"What are you going to do to get publicity for the boys' work?" he asked.

"I am going to get hold of the best assistant I can find," I answered, "and turn that job over to him and forget it. If you know anybody who could handle the thing," I said, "and who would work congenially with you, I'll try to get him. I have nobody in mind."

He said: "There's a young man named Osborn, in Buffalo, who is in the advertising business and who has a genius for this sort of thing. He has handled the publicity for all the Red Cross and Y. M. C. A. campaigns there. I wish you could persuade him to come along."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"I'll wire him at once," I answered.

As soon as we reached Atlanta I walked over to the telegraph desk in the lobby of the Piedmont Hotel and sent a telegram to Alex F. Osborn, Buffalo, asking him if he could meet me on our arrival in New York. Osborn came.

There was another advertising man in the campaign, Roy S. Durstine by name, and we three were thrown very intimately together. In fact, when the campaign was over we knew each other more intimately than if we had spent four years in college together. So it was natural that we should decide to put ourselves on a peace basis together.

Thus it came about that the firm of Barton, Durstine and Osborn was formed —the second important step in my business life. Because of a chance meeting on the train, and a telegram sent from Atlanta to Buffalo to a man whose name I had never even heard.

SINCE such little happenings change great events, who can regard his own puny will or effort as a source of pride? Who can fail to be humbly grateful for whatever luck has turned his steps into pleasant paths, or can deny his obligation to those who may have worked just as diligently, but to whom the breaks have not come?

It has been remarked very often that when you meet a really big man you almost invariably find a simple man, devoid of pride and arrogance. One reason for it lies in the fact that every man in a big position knows in his own heart that forces entirely outside himself have played a large part in his making. He himself is only partly responsible. But I think it safe to conclude that breaks tend to happen to those who are prepared to receive them. And that even in the luckiest lives it still is true that there is no substitute for work. I talked with the president of a very large corporation one night. I asked him about his life.

"It's been just a series of accidents," he said simply. And he went on to tell how, in looking around for a job after graduation from college, he happened into the shops of a struggling little company on the outskirts of New York. It made a product which was beginning to be used by various manufacturers, but progress was slow.

Then suddenly came the automobile, demanding great quantities of the product. Production and profits leaped forward. My friend's father had been successful as a merchant, and had retired with a snug fortune of about $200,000. He took $150,000 and invested it in "absolutely safe securities." The other $50,000 he dropped with fear and trembling into this new-fangled business of his son.

See now what curious things happen in this supposedly sound and sensible business world. The $150,000 which the father had put into absolutely safe securities proved a total loss. But there came a merger including the son's company in which the father had risked his $50,000, and father and son together sold out for more than ten million dollars.

found that he could not administer it, so he invited our friend to come back and take charge of the whole big proposition. Later, the merger went into a still bigger merger, and again there were difficulties of administration, and again the eyes of the directors happened to light on the young man.

THIS is the story he told me that night as we sat in the rear end of a private car, speeding between Buffalo and Pittsburgh. "Just a series of accidents," he repeated. There was no pretense in that statement, no false modesty. He honestly believed that favorable circumstances have been the principal factor in his career. But I was with him on that private car for a week, and I had a pretty good opportunity to see him at close range.

We were visiting the dealers who represented his tremendous company. Every morning we woke up to find our car in a new city. We had breakfast at seven; we left the car at eight. Until twelve o'clock the president was in the office of one dealer after another, asking questions, digging into difficulties, encouraging criticism, trying to get facts on which the corporation could base sounder and more efficient policies. At twelve-thirty there was a luncheon in the hotel, attended by dealers from surrounding cities and towns, sometimes several hundred of them. The president spoke.

And after luncheon he sat in a room and received those men, one at a time, went over figures with them, discussed their problems, and encouraged them to draw on his energy and enthusiasm to the limit. At dinner time we had another group of men, with a fresh set of problems. After dinner, on the car, the district representatives would gather for a discussion of their hopes and worries.

The multimillionaire's life may have been "just a series of accidents." But he was always on his toes to take advantage of them. He was always giving his heart and soul to the work at hand and keeping his eyes wide open.

Many men fail to cash in on their luck because they get discouraged and quit too soon.

One of my friends in New York has the reputation for being decidedly lucky. His career is a romance which deserves a whole article, but these are the high spots: He was working for a shoe company in New England when he had a nervous breakdown which compelled him to travel for a year. On a boat he fell in with a young Englishman who was visiting a tropical country to study rubber, and he decided to go along. He became enthusiastic about rubber, and, returning to this country, persuaded one of the big rubber companies to buy some plantations and produce its own raw material. Subsequently, he became a director of this company, and when he retired from it sold his interests for several million dollars. These millions he put into the oil business, from which he accumulated a very much larger fortune.

Wonderful luck, you say. Nothing like that could happen to one man in a million. It could never happen to me. But I have omitted two important little details in this narrative. When he came back from that first trip to the rubber plantations, and attempted to interest an American company he was, to use his own words, "literally thrown out of the office day after day." As often as he was thrown out, he returned. Every morning he was on the front porch, waiting to be kicked off again. Finally, his very persistence won an interview; the chairman of the board was curious to see what sort of human being could stand so many rebuffs. Out of that interview came his start in the rubber business.

As for his fortune in oil, it did not come until the last dollar of his rubber fortune had gone into what seemed to be a hopeless dry hole. I mean this literally and without a particle of exaggeration. Hundreds of thousands, even millions, had gone. He was living on borrowed money, dodging creditors, compelled to adopt the most embarrassing sort of expedients to keep afloat. Friends told him he was crazy. They urged him with all their power to give up while he still had something left. He turned a deaf ear to them all. He believed that the oil was there, and that, if he could hold out long enough, he would find it. He was actually on a train to see his principal creditor and beg for a few days' extension on his note—the last possible extension—when a telegram announcing that oil had been struck was handed to him. He has been very lucky, people say; but without his dogged determination he would never have lasted long enough to realize on his luck.

THERE is a third factor in luck, as I observe it, and that is the habit of thought. Henry Ford said one time: "Thinking is the hardest work there is." He added that he could find plenty of men to execute and administer, but hardly anybody who could think.

The amount of thinking in the average office, as contrasted with the amount of work that goes forward as a result of mere routine, is probably much less than one per cent. The lucky men may have a lot of routine to handle, but they are not buried by it. Somehow, sometime, either in the day or at night or on the golf course, or somewhere, they force their minds to meet the question: "How can I get myself so organized that if Luck pays a visit to my establishment I shall be there, and free to entertain the call?"

Finally, I am quite convinced that luck likes minds that have not closed. It knocks at many doors that are locked against it. The mind inside has learned a few business tricks by which its owner is making a living, and it has shut itself against any new ideas. The owner still may be a young man in years, but mentally he is old; and the happy circumstance that might mean fortune to a mind more alert is allowed by him to slip away.

What inspiration there is in a mind like Edison's, which keeps right on in eager search for new truth, even after the body has registered the wear and tear of more than eighty years! What an inspiration to see Henry Ford at an age when most men are resting on their laurels, tackling gayly the total reconstruction of his tremendous enterprise! Such men cannot fail to get more than their measure of luck, for the front door of their intelligence is always open, and on the doormat in blazing letters is the "welcome" sign.

You, too, can enjoy

Instant Sleep — the kind that gives you All-Day Energy

(without drugs)

More than 20,000 doctors recommend it

We offer this 3-day test

WHEN you go to bed do your nerves stay up? Leaving you dragged out on the morrow—your mornings logy, your energies drained by afternoon?

If so, don't ever take drugs in order to sleep. For drugs never do give restful sleep. They always make you feel "logy" and dull the next day.

Today there is no need for using drugs. For you can now drink a pure food-beverage called Ovaltine that gives you instant restful sleep. Doctors everywhere recommend it not only because it induces sleep in a natural way, but also because they value so highly its special concentrated food properties which build up and restore your tired mind and body as you sleep.

Hence, morning finds you a new man. You are fresh, clear-eyed, buoyant. You have the energy to carry you right through the day and into the evening.

We offer you here a 3-day test. To let you prove what we claim. Note how much better you sleep; how refreshed you feel when you awaken.

Why Ovaltine brings restoring sleep

Authorities agree that digestive unrest is the main cause of sleeplessness. Ovaltine overcomes this condition in two ways:

FIRST—It digests very quickly itself. Even in cases of impaired digestion.

SECOND—It has the unusual power of digesting 4 to 5 times its own weight of other foods you eat. Hence, it aids your stomach. Digestion goes on speedily and efficiently. Frayed nerves are soothed. Sound sleep follows. And as you sleep, the special food properties of Ovaltine also help to restore your tired mind and body. (One cup of Ovaltine has actually more food value than 12 cups of beef extract, 7 cups of cocoa, or 3 eggs.)

That is why, after drinking a cup of hot Ovaltine at night, you awaken in the morning so completely refreshed, abounding with new-found vitality and tireless energy. Note the unsolicited testimonials.

Hospitals and Doctors recommend it

Ovaltine has been in use in Switzerland for over 30 years. Now in universal use in England and her colonies. During the great war it was served as a standard ration to invalid soldiers.

A few years ago Ovaltine was introduced into this country. Today hundreds of hospitals use it. More than 20,000 doctors recommend it. Not only for sleeplessness, but because of its special dietetic properties, they also recommend it for nerve-strain, malnutrition, underweight and delicate children, nursing mothers and the aged.

Make this 3-day test

Just make a 3-day test of Ovaltine. Note the difference not only in your sleep, but in your next day's energy. You tackle your work with greater vigor. You "carry through" for the whole day. You aren't too tired to go out for the evening. There's a new zest to your work; to all your daily activities. It's truly a "pick-up" drink—for any time of the day.

Druggists and grocers sell Ovaltine in 4 sizes for home use. Or get it at the soda fountain. But to let you try it we will send a 3-day introductory package for 10c to cover cost of packing and mailing. Just send in coupon with 10c.

Brighter, more enjoyable evenings this way

Listless evenings are generally caused by exhausted energy. Ovaltine brings restoring sleep that gives energy that outlasts the day. Mr. Mitchell says:

"I was in a run-down condition—could not sleep at night. Since taking Ovaltine I feel 100% better; sleep very well and do not tire during the day." C. Mitchell, Hibbing, Minn.

Here's sleep that brings ambitious days

Ovaltine brings the kind of sleep that gives you tireless stamina. Mr. Pelican found:

"Before I used Ovaltine I didn't know what a good night's sleep was. Now I sleep every night and feel much more like working. Ovaltine is wonderful." F. H. Pelican, Philadelphia, Pa.

For that refreshed glow when you wake up

Mr. Eldridge writes:

"I am under a heavy nervous and physical strain every day. Ovaltine produces sleep that makes me wake up refreshed. No more brain fag." W. H. Eldridge, Bronx, New York City.

mind she saw him as clearly as though she were gazing into his face, and during that ride she was aware of little else.

She knew now that she had loved him since those first days on Sani'gilagi; that by then Gilbert Barradell had become a phantom which still seemed real but which had no reality. She wondered vaguely that she had not recognized sooner the change which had been taking place in her; and she thought with wonder —wonder which was not vague but sharp and almost awe-inspiring—of the tremendous revelation which had come to her suddenly in that dreadful moment in the moonlit meadow when she saw Lachlan battling with Falcon, and believed that he was lost to her forever.

Yes, these things were cause for wonder, and, dreaming thus, she wondered at them. But in the fact that she who had loved Gilbert Barradell now loved Lachlan McDonald she found nothing strange. All that had gone before seemed unreal, childish, utterly unimportant. Her life had begun when Lachlan McDonald came into it.

MILE after mile the buffalo path wound through the splendid virgin forest of the mountains and the upper foothills; and mile after mile Jolie rode on, seeing little, hearing little of what passed around her.

Suddenly Almayne flung up his hand and jerked his horse to a halt. Then, with a quick motion of his arm urging haste, he wheeled to the right out of the buffalo path, riding diagonally up the steep wooded slope, the others following. Behind a kalmia thicket well above the path, he halted them.

"Watch the path," he whispered.

For perhaps a minute they waited. Then from below came a muffled snort and, later, a dull thudding, as of hoofs. Gazing through a gap in the kalmia foliage, Jolie saw the huge bulk of a buffalo bull in the path below, another and another and another—bulls, cows, and calves, plodding onward in single file until two hundred or more had passed.

Almayne watched them eagerly, anxiously. Finally, when the last of them had vanished, he uttered an exclamation of satisfaction.

"I feared that when they smelled our traces they would break into the woods," he said. "Luck's with us. They will wipe out our tracks in the buffalo path."

For a moment he sat his horse, thinking deeply, tugging at his white mustache, his lean brown hand fingering his rifle. Then, with a gruff word to his piebald pony, he led the way along the mountainside, turning at last not down toward the path, but up the slope through the woods toward the ridge's summit. Presently he beckoned Lachlan, and the latter rode forward and joined him.

"A mile beyond the divide," he said, "we can strike the old trading road, leading to the river ford and thence to the Fort. The road is hard and broad and we can make speed. What think you, lad? Shall we keep to the woods or risk a dash in the open?"

Lachlan, pondering the question, saw the hunter's face grow suddenly tense, saw his lips frame a smothered exclamation, saw the long black rifle leap to his shoulder. Almost instantly came the rifle's hollow crash, and next moment from the forest ahead of them rang out a long, quavering yell.

Almayne, his eyes like blue embers, flung up his hand in a gesture commanding silence. For a few moments they waited, breathless and rigid; then from far behind and below came a long whoop, tremulous, musical, indescribably menacing.

Almayne swore huskily.

"I winged him," he growled; "but he gave the signal and they heard it. They were closer behind us than I thought. We must ride for it now!"

Jolie touched Lachlan's arm.

"What has happened?" she asked.

"Almayne saw a Cherokee scout and wounded him," Lachlan told her quickly. "He must have come through the woods while the others followed the buffalo path. They heard his signal and they are coming. We must strike for the old trading road and make a dash for the Fort."

Already Almayne's pony was crashing through the underbrush as his rider urged him up the slope. Lachlan leaned over and pressed his lips to Jolie's forehead. For an instant she clung to him. Then she bent forward over Selu's neck as he plunged through the thicket in the path that Almayne had broken. As her slim form straightened, Lachlan saw her sweep her hand across her eyes; but when she turned and looked back, she was smiling and her eyes were bright, and his heart leaped at the spectacle of her beauty and her courage.

They gained the top of the divide and began the descent of the farther slope. They heard no more whoops behind them, but Lachlan knew that their pursuers would have no difficulty in following the trail. Luck had not been with them, after all.

The pursuers had been so close behind them on the buffalo path that the passage of the herd, obliterating their tracks, had gained them no respite.

THEIR lives depended now upon their speed. One fact was in their favor: Lachlan knew from the whoops which they had heard that these Indians following their trail were Cherokees, not Appalaches, and the Cherokee war parties were generally unmounted. If they could reach the old trading road in time they could outdistance these pursuers, provided no other enemies barred the way. Lachlan knew also how grave this danger was, knew that they could hardly hope to ride that road unseen and unchallenged. But the risk had to be faced. There was no choice now.

Half way down the slope of the ridge Lachlan spoke briefly to Striking Hawk and Little Mink as they walked for a little space beside his horse. In the woods the two Muskogees easily kept pace with the horses, but in the open road this would be flames caught me!"

"We were living at a saw mill camp. One day our house caught fire. I rushed upstairs to save my baby. A celluloid comb in my hair ignited. My hair caught and my clothing . . . the doctor immediately applied Unguentine. Relief from pain was almost instantaneous. We kept on with the Unguentine and in an amazingly short time the burns were healed. Now scarcely a mark can be seen. Needless to say, Unguentine is always in my medicine chest."

DAILY we read of the ravages of flames. For fire can mean tragedy—the agony of scorched flesh, the legacy of terrible scars.

Take no chances with any burn. Burns from stoves . . . Hot water burns . . . The many burns to children. Spread on Unguentine at once!

In 8 out of 10 hospitals, in the hands of physicians everywhere, this surgical dressing daily performs its merciful task. Keep it on hand.

Apply Unguentine liberally. It has the power to soothe the pain—instantly. It kills dangerous germs, protects the tissues antiseptically. It starts speedy, healthy healing. Soon, almost invariably, not a scar remains!

For cuts, bruises and scratches Unguentine's healing powers are equally effective. In severe cases apply on gauze and bandage lightly. At your druggist's—50c. The Norwich Pharmacal Co., Norwich, N. Y.

impossible. Yet Lachlan felt little anxiety for his two henchmen. Knowing their woodcraft, he was fairly confident that they could make their way through the forest to the Fort.

The woods thinned, the giant trees standing far apart. Just below lay the bottom of the valley, level almost as the palm of a man's hand—and straight down this valley, with the wooded heights rising on either side, ran the road.

Lachlan's heart gave a leap. He had feared that here they might come upon another war party, for the road was a thoroughfare for the Cherokee bands; but save for two bunches of grazing deer, the valley was empty as far as his eye could see.

They were well out in the open heading for the road when a hoarse shout from Almayne startled them. The hunter was pointing with his rifle. Far away up the valley, where the road swung 'round a jutting promontory of woods, Lachlan saw a large party of Indians, some mounted, some on foot—evidently a mixed band of Appalaches and Cherokees, two hundred or more in number.

In an instant Lachlan knew that Almayne had not shouted rashly. They had already been seen. As he gazed, the mounted Appalaches drew apart from the others, racing their ponies along the path, while behind them a cloud of dust whirled upward.

Almayne's voice shrilled like a trumpet: "Ride! Ride!"

AT FULL speed they dashed for the road and, reaching it, swung to the left down the valley. Jolie, glancing backward, saw O'Sullivan just behind her on his sorrel Chickasaw pony, and behind him Lachlan on Tuti the Snowbird, while some distance to the rear the two Muskogee warriors were bounding onward on foot.

The road passed through a belt of trees extending outward from the mountainside at a point where the valley narrowed; and Jolie, stealing another glance behind, saw that Little Mink and Striking Hawk were with them no longer. They had turned aside, she supposed, into the belt of timber; but there was no time to think of them now.

Her horse was abreast of Almayne's, and she realized that he was shouting to her.

"To the left . . . when you reach the ford!" She could barely distinguish the words above the thunder of hoofs. In a moment she had drawn in front of Almayne and, head over shoulder, she saw O'Sullivan also pass the hunter.

Her hand tightened on the bridle rein. For an instant she believed that Almayne and Lachlan were holding back to fight the pursuers so that she could escape; but soon she saw that they were racing onward side by side, and she knew that the time to fight had not yet come—that not yet must she turn and die beside her lover.

Suddenly she heard, or thought that she heard, the faint sound of a shot, followed instantly by another. Again she looked back; and behind her she saw the pursuers dashing outward from the belt of trees—a swift-flowing stream of plunging horses and plumed and painted Indians, half-hidden in swirls of dust.

Lachlan, too, had heard the shots and was looking back. Even as he watched, he saw an Indian pitch from his pony and plunge headlong to the ground, while another drew slowly to a halt, sat swaying a moment on his horse's back, then fell sideways heavily.

Lachlan laughed exultantly. Little Mink and Striking Hawk, in ambush in that belt of trees, had struck a hard blow at their enemies before beginning their flight through the woods.

But that blow checked the pursuit not an instant. Three riders turned back to help the unmounted Indians in the rear search the belt of timber whence the shots had come. The others, at least fifty in number, dashed on without pause, bending low on their ponies' backs, whooping, yelling, flourishing their rifles, their bows and their long lances of hickory or cane pointed with bone or flint.

Through the dust swirls behind her Jolie caught glimpses of them now and then. A warrior on a white horse led them. Even at that distance she could see his headdress of pink flamingo feathers streaming in the wind, could catch flashes of white and brilliant red in the tossing plumes of his followers.

The spectacle fascinated her, its wild and terrible beauty delighted her as no spectacle had ever delighted her before. There was no fear in her. Instead, a frenzy of exultation possessed her, and she gloried in the strength of her lissome body, in the skill of her horsemanship, which neither Almayne nor Lachlan could excel.

Of the four horses, hers was the swiftest; and she knew that she was getting his best out of him—that no other rider could have handled Selu better in that mad race.

And ever and always during that race she was thinking of Lachlan. Before her eyes his face shone; the pounding hoofs of the horses thundered his name. Womanly fear had gone from her; yet she was a woman still, for as she rode, she exulted in the thought that he saw her now superbly. splendidly beautiful, with a kind of beauty that no woman had ever shown him before.

Long ago she had lost her hat, and her long hair streamed behind her like a flame. Again and again she looked back and saw that his eyes were upon her; and twice, swinging her slim body erect, she flung her hand high above her head and waved him a greeting through the dust.

THE road crossed a stream, swung to the left around the steep wooded shoulder of a hill, turned sharply to the right again in a long loop. The surface was rocky and uneven here; of necessity she checked Selu's speed. Presently behind her she heard a burst of shouts and yells. Out of the woods to the right of the road the pursuers were streaming, so near at hand now that a little cry burst from her.

With a sudden tightening of the throat, Jolie realized what had happened—they had taken a short cut around the other side of the hill and had reduced the distance by half.

It was a desperate race now—and soon it became not only a race but a battle. Some of the Appalaches were firing as they rode; three times the crack of rifles broke through the thunder of hoofs. It came over Jolie all at once that the end was near.

Her hand tightened on Selu's rein, checking his stride. They would be over-

The Secret of Getting Ahead

The quickest way to bigger pay as proved by thousands every year...

WHAT are you doing to prove to your employer that he should increase your salary?

It's not enough, you know, just to be faithful, hard working, a plugger. If you are, that's a help. But what he is primarily interested in, so far as his business is concerned, is—greater profits.

And the man who can help him make those greater profits is going to win promotion and win it fast.

How, then, can you do all this—in a way that will quickly mean an increased paycheck? Let's examine a few cases—out of the many that could be cited.

Increases Sales—Increases Salary

J. L. Aldrich was an order clerk. His home-study training with LaSalle—in Business Management—prompted him to take up selling. He knew that in the selling field he had real opportunity to build greater profits for his employer.

Joining the sales force of the Monroe Calculating Machine Co., Inc., he became one of their most consistent producers; his sales steadily increasing, until within two years he was made manager of the Fargo, N. Dak., district, with an increase in earnings of 153¾ per cent.

Changes Losses Into Profits

It took years for Ernest W. Neir to come up through the ranks in hotel work by the "experience route." Then he took up home-study training with LaSalle—in Higher Accountancy. His immediate task was to put the Hotel Rowe, one of the finest hotels in Grand Rapids, on a paying basis. With the aid of his training, Mr. Neir changed losses into profits—and increased his salary more than 100 per cent.

A Big Saving — and a Bigger "Raise" Than He Expected

H. S. Leavy, of Kingston, Pa., saw his chance in Traffic Management. He enrolled with LaSalle for home-study training, and during the first year saved his firm $40,000—simply by changing its method of packing for shipment, thereby obtaining a different freight classification and a more favorable rate.

"This saving," he writes, "procured for me the title of Traffic Manager and a salary above my expectations. Since starting my training with LaSalle my compensation has increased about 300 per cent."

Boosts Production 59 Per Cent

J. R. Hollingsworth was in charge of a shift of men in one of the big factories in Akron. To further his advancement, he pursued home-study training in Industrial Management. Read this paragraph from a letter to LaSalle:

> "With the aid of my assistants and the whole-hearted support of the men, I have brought the shift from the most inefficient to one of the most efficient, with an increase in production of 59 per cent. When I started, my men were disgusted—ready to quit; their earnings averaged 68c an hour; they average 98c now. Haven't had to fire a man. Have made 27 suggestions so far, showing savings from $20 to $75 daily."

How can any man who pursues such methods—training in his spare hours for increased knowledge and ability whereby he may help cut expenses or get more business and profits for his employer—fail to win sure and swift advancement?

Start Today to Make Yourself Worth More Money

And so we could go on and on—through hundreds of instances reported to LaSalle by members who have successfully pursued this quicker way to bigger pay.

But you have enough proof. What is needed now is decision—action!

Below this text there's a coupon. It will bring you with our compliments a book fully describing the opportunities in the business field that most appeals to you—clearly outlining your shorter path to a bigger income.

Start on that path by clipping and mailing the coupon—NOW.

taken soon, and she must be at Lachlan's side when that grim moment came.

Behind her she heard O'Sullivan shouting; and, glancing back, she saw Lachlan close behind him and, close behind Lachlan, Almayne. Lachlan was waving to her furiously, urging her on. He drew his body erect and pointed ahead with his rifle; and, swinging her gaze to the front again, she saw at the foot of a long, gentle, grassy slope the waters of a river glittering in the sun.

Her heels dug into Selu's flanks. Down the green slope she raced, the others crowding her close. Yet hope was dead in her, for she saw their fate clearly now.

They had reached the ford too late. They would be shot from the bank as their horses struggled in the waters of the river.

She was almost at the river edge and she bore to the left, remembering the words that Almayne had shouted to her. A strong arm gripped her waist, dragged her from Selu's back, swung her to the right and flung her down. . . .

She lay, bruised and half-dazed, behind a great rock close to the water, and beside her Almayne and Lachlan were crouching, their rifles leveled, while beyond them O'Sullivan stood, lips tight, eyes blazing, his naked sword clenched in his hand. Down the long slope the Appalaches were charging, a torrent of yelling braves and plunging horses, rifles, tomahawks and lances waving, feathers streaming in the wind.

Almayne's rifle cracked; a moment later, Lachlan's. An Indian doubled over backward, sprawled for an instant on his horse's crupper, fell and rolled over and over in the grass. Simultaneously, a piebald pony crumpled in full stride, sending his rider flying, and another pony, smashing into the fallen horse, fell also, as his rider leaped clear.

Still the others came on—an avalanche of plumed and painted warriors, riding high on their horses' backs, swinging their weapons madly, yelling like fiends.

NOTHING could stop them, Jolie knew. This was the end.

A coldness came upon her like the coldness of death, and with it an utter indifference to fate. It was as though she were a mere looker-on at some tremendous pageant; and the pageant thrilled her, filled her with a fierce, frenzied joy in its barbaric beauty.

For an instant this mad joy possessed her; then followed fear—fear which seemed to grip her throat with physical hands and stop her breath. They were so near now that for a frightful moment she saw their faces—the faces of demons, of devils, streaked and daubed with black, red, and yellow, the eyes ringed with glaring circles of white paint.

She tried to struggle to her feet, but her hand slipped on a loose fragment of shale, and she fell sideways, so that her eyes were turned toward the river.

Beyond the stream she saw a man leap upon a rock—a white man in the buff and blue of a Provincial Ranger. He waved his hat, and from the dense bushes fringing the river bank on either side of him burst little puffs and jets of flame and smoke.

The bushes parted, and men leaped out, ran along the bank, dashed into the water and began wading across—white men all of them, most of them in buff and blue, some in buckskins, all armed with rifles.

The trees beyond the river swayed and danced before her, swirled madly, then vanished in an all-engulfing blackness. When she opened her eyes, Lachlan had her in his arms, strange men with rifles in their hands were moving and talking all around her, and beside her Almayne was standing, his rifle leveled, its long barrel resting on the rock in front of him.

Beyond the rock she saw men lying—brown, half-naked men, their limbs and their upturned faces fantastically streaked and ringed with paint, feathers of many colors in their heads—Indians, Appalaches, some eight or ten of them, sprawled in grotesque attitudes on the ground.

Far up the slope, apparently well beyond rifle range, the main body of Appalaches were sitting their ponies, gesticulating, milling excitedly to and fro. A little apart from them, erect on his white horse, she saw the tall chief with the pink flamingo headdress. He sat facing the others, his back turned to the river. Apparently he was haranguing his followers, urging them to the attack, and as he talked he flourished his long lance, waving it above his head.

Suddenly he wheeled his horse, flung his lance high in triumph and caught it as it fell. A moment he waited motionless, pointing down the hill, horse and rider poised for the charge.

Almayne's rifle spoke. The chief with the pink headdress sagged slowly forward on his horse's neck. The others, crowding 'round him, gripped his arms and held him on his horse as the whole body of them rode hurriedly up the slope and disappeared over the brow of the hill.

A short, bearded man in buff and blue, standing near Jolie, cursed delightedly, while others leaped upon the rock and cheered. Almayne turned to Lachlan with a grin.

"A far shot," he said coolly; "I got him just in time. Another half-minute—"

Lachlan was scarcely conscious of the words. He was holding Jolie in his arms, smoothing the glistening hair above her temples.

IN THE book which Mr. Francis O'Sullivan wrote in his later years about the warfare of the Indians, he gives us a final glimpse of these two lovers.

"It was God's Providence" (he says) "that as we reached the river a scouting Party from Fort Prince George were resting just across the Stream. They saw us coming, and their sudden Volley from Ambush saved us, for nine Enemies fell and the rest broke and ran, believing they were in a Trap. While they were preparing a second Charge, which might well have overwhelmed us, Almayne with a marvelous long Shot killed their Leader, and they drew off out of Sight, so that we all got safely across and rode, with our Rescuers walking beside us, toward the Fort, which was some little distance down the Stream.

"Now, as I rode beside Almayne, with Lachlan and Jolie riding just ahead, there was a Shadow on my Heart; for I said to myself: 'Lachlan McDonald is of the Wilderness and must dwell there: he must return to his People in the Land of Talasé or be false to his Trust. But Jolie is of England. She has known the Lights of London. Will they not beckon her to come back?'

NO castings are used in COLTS. When you realize that the normal load of a modern revolver develops a pressure of fifteen thousand pounds per square inch there is an added satisfaction in knowing that COLTS are made to withstand this terrific strain with an extra fifty per cent safety margin. Hence you can readily appreciate why a drop-forged COLT "stands up" and gives years of honest service. That's why a COLT costs more and is worth more.

The same exacting care, plus expert craftsmanship extends to all COLT manufacturing processes. The production of one COLT alone requires 564 machine operations, 124 hand operations and 332 visual and gauge inspections.

If you would like to start or join a local Revolver Club, send us your name. Women, too, may enroll. Catalog No. 35 is ready. Want it?

Every act performed in the manufacture of every COLT is on the side of safety—your safety!

COLT has but one grade of quality—the highest possible to attain.

"So I mused, like a pessimistickal old Fool, because by now I should have known this Woman.

"When we were come out upon a wooded Eminence whence we could look down upon Fort Prince George, we reined in to enjoy the noble Prospect; and Lachlan and Jolie sat their Horses close beside me, so that I heard what passed between them.

"'Where lies Talasé?' she asked.

"He pointed to the Southwest.

"'A far Journey,' she said thoughtfully. 'Far from here and very far from London and the Hills of Hampshire.'

"She saw that his Eyes were troubled, and she smiled at him.

"'We shall live there,' she said, 'and I shall be the Wife of Lachlan McDonald, Prince of the Muskogee Nation and Chief of the Family of the Wind. I shall be very happy in Talasé and I shall not pine for England!'

"He gazed at her strangely, and his black Eyes were marvelously bright.

"'Sometimes,' he told her, 'we shall visit Charles Town, for my People and the English live at Peace. And perhaps some Day we shall see London and the Hampshire Hills.'

"She seemed not to hear him.

"'I wonder,' she said softly, as though she were communing with her own Thoughts, 'whether there will be a Minister in Fort Prince George!'" after the evening's work was over. He led us into the country on a dark, lonely bridge spanning some swiftly-running black water. In the middle of the bridge he halted us, and there we waited for a time silently; I, at least, in a growing trepidation.

Houdini—The Master Magician

"Finally a distant bell tolled solemnly twelve times. As soon as the last beat ceased to reverberate, Houdini clasped his brother's hand and mine together, raised them aloft, and cried, 'Beatrice, Dash, raise your hands to heaven and swear you will both be true to me. Never betray me in any way, so help you God!'

"His brother and I repeated the vow after him. Then Houdini kissed me and shook Theodore's hand. 'I know you will keep that sacred oath,' he said.

"By this time I was in a state of panicky terror. The eerie sky, the lonely bridge in a waste of marshland, the black water—and then this dramatic and terrible vow—these things seemed wholly abnormal and strange to my simple experiences. It was apparent that this Houdini, whom I had known less than two weeks, was an inexplicable person, probably a madman, and his brother was no better. I glanced at the black water and wondered what those two strangers intended to do to me next in that lonely place. As soon as I got to a firm road, to a lighted street, I would make a break for it and find my way home to my mother.

"But there were no more dramatics that night. Houdini sensed my fears and immediately began to lead me away and reassure me. By the time we reached the lighted streets his gentleness and tenderness had restored my tranquillity.

"Then came a night when I really fled from Houdini, convinced that I had married the devil.

"That evening Houdini laughingly remarked that I had never told him the first name of my father, who had died some years before. He told me to write the name on a piece of paper, crumple it in my hand, and then burn it in the gas jet without showing it to him. After the paper was burned he said: 'Now, give me the ashes.'

"Thereupon, he bared his forearm and rubbed the ashes on the under part, and immediately my father's name, Gebhardt, appeared on the skin in letters of blood.

"I was paralyzed with fear. Then, slowly, a full realization of the significance of this diabolical thing dawned on me. In my early folk-lore, the devil, disguised as a handsome young man, lured girls to destruction. It was clear to me that I had married the devil. Stealthily, my eyes on Houdini, I backed toward the door, and then turned suddenly and ran, screaming frantically, from the room and from the house. Houdini made after me and soon caught me up in his arms. 'Silly kid, it was only a trick,' he cried reassuringly. 'Oh, let me go! Let me go!' I screamed, biting and kicking him in a frenzy of terror. Finally he quieted me; but it was not until after we had returned to the room and he had shown me how the simple trick was done that I became completely reassured.

"By such demonstrations he gradually drove away my superstitions. Among other things, he taught me the secret of mind-reading and all the arts of legerdemain, including how to go into trances and tell fortunes.

"During the short period before Houdini's partnership with his brother Theodore was dissolved I became pretty well acclimatized to my new environment. Shortly after the dissolution, there was witnessed, in an obscure concert hall, the début of 'the Houdinis—Harry and Bessie,' described in our early playbills as 'Master Monarchs of Modern Mystery.' This partnership lasted through Houdini's life."

THE Great Houdinis had very humble beginnings. Precarious weekly engagements in small beer halls and dime museums formed their beat, and they were glad to fill those. Ten shows or more a day formed the regular routine and their combined salary was usually twenty dollars a week.

Whenever they were desperate for work, Houdini would wire to Chicago, and Mr. Hedges, manager of Kohl and Middleton's, would send car fare and give them an engagement.

They worked on what was called the Curio Stage, where all the freaks were exhibited. Ten to twenty shows a day were the rule. Houdini would do the handcuff escapes alone every other show, so that his wife's performances—she sang and danced—would be cut to a maximum of ten, for she was never of robust health. The handcuff act, however, attracted little attention, for in those early days

"GETS-IT" World's Fastest Way

Houdini seemed unable to sell his audiences on it.

One morning, when they were playing a concert hall in a small town in Wisconsin, Mrs. Houdini was reading one of the local papers when her eye caught this astonishing notice:

Challenge! I, the undersigned, have deposited with the manager of the Theatre One Hundred Dollars ($100), which I will forfeit to the person who can handcuff me so I cannot escape. Harry Houdini, Handcuff King and Jail Breaker.

The item frightened her nearly out of her wits. One hundred dollars! She had never seen so much money. She rushed to Houdini, who shamefacedly admitted that he had saved that amount, but dared not tell her for fear she would demand a new coat.

This sudden affluence filled Beatrice Houdini with pride. She clipped the item and mailed it to her sister Stella, who had surreptitiously kept her in clothes since her marriage. Stella naturally showed the clipping to her mother, who immediately fainted. The poor woman had only the vaguest notion how the man her daughter had married supported himself; but she now gathered from the clipping that Beatrice was married to a jail-breaker.

Back in New York, the Houdinis had several small engagements at Huber's Museum, on Fourteenth Street.

EVERY morning Houdini would be out of bed at five and off to the market, where he would buy for the day such things as their slender purse permitted. On the way back he would drop into a restaurant and fetch the morning coffee in a tin can. While his wife straightened up the little furnished room, he would be out in all sorts of weather, visiting barrooms, buying cards, doing tricks to pay for them. Usually he was offered drinks. As he never used alcohol, he became an adept at refusing without causing resentment.

Once when the Houdinis were playing at Huber's, E. F. Albee, the youthful manager of the Keith circuit, who had a habit of prowling about looking for talent, drifted into the museum and watched the show. Houdini's handcuff act made a great impression on him, and eventually he got the magician into an engagement at the Keith house in Boston. He was the first Houdini fan among the Eastern managers and remained one of Houdini's oldest friends to the end. "I saw every one of Houdini's tricks and stunts," he once remarked, "and I haven't the least idea how he did a single one of them."

However, long before Houdini played Keith's, he received a summons which he thought might prove a short-cut to fame. This was at the beginning of 1895; he was twenty years old, and he and his wife were filling obscure engagements in the South. He was appearing at a concert hall owned by Captain West, grandfather of George West, the dancer, when he received a wire from an agent announcing that he and his wife were booked to play Tony Pastor's in New York.

Tony Pastor's! Houdini could hardly believe it. That famous hall was still in its glory, in the nineties, a national institution, as well known in its way as its immediate neighbor, Tammany Hall.

Houdini was so excited by the prospect that he spent all his money advertising in the theatrical papers: "Next week at Tony Pastor's—The Great Houdinis, Harry and Bessie." Captain West advanced the fare to New York.

But the week at Tony Pastor's did not prove any open sesame to fame, even though they carried away with them an endorsement written by the mighty Tony himself. For players and politicians alike, fame follows publicity. Houdini's minor act, in the worst position on Tony Pastor's bill, was naturally ignored by the New York papers. Houdini had not yet learned the peculiar art of so dramatizing his great skill as to compel the attention of news editors.

FAILING to break into first-class engagements by way of Tony Pastor's, the Houdinis, in the spring of 1895, joined Welsh Brothers Circus, a ten-twent'-thirt' show without animals, which toured the smaller Eastern towns during the open season.

The show had a banner outside the tent depicting a most ferocious Wild Man. In most towns, no one missed the wild man; but in one of the one-night stands a crowd of young fellows began to demand him. "Where's your Wild Man? Where is He?" The cry was gradually taken up through the audience.

A hasty back-stage consultation was held, and Houdini volunteered to add the Wild Man to his repertoire. An old wooden cage was found for him, he rumpled his hair (which, in those days, he wore long and bushy), improvised clothes out of some old sacks.

The ring-master made a preliminary address about the capture of the Wild Man in the depths in the Java jungle after he had terrorized the countryside, and described how he lived on a diet of raw meat, cigarettes, and cigars. Then the cage was drawn in, with Houdini growling and tearing at a bit of raw meat. The Wild Man was an immediate hit, and became a permanent feature.

On one occasion, Houdini's cleverness with locks served his circus associates well. One Sunday, the circus gave a show at a little place near Providence, Rhode Island, and a zealous blue-law sheriff arrested the whole troupe for violating the Sunday law. When the sheriff gathered in all the performers, Mr. Welsh had left for a flying trip to New York, so they had no defender. After a brief hearing, the sheriff locked the troupe in the town jail overnight, pending a further disposition of the case.

In the lockup the fat woman wept bitterly. Her cell was too small, and she was wholly uncomfortable and miserable. So, after the sheriff had gone off and everything was quiet, Houdini deftly picked the locks of the jail, and the whole company stole quietly back to the big tent. The next day Mr. Welsh arrived to fix matters with the sheriff, and the circus pulled stakes and went quietly away from there.

The Houdinis were both quick-tempered, so they had to develop a technique to avoid domestic flare-ups. The system of signals whereby they could converse quietly in the midst of company was helpful. One of Houdini's cues was the raising of the left eyelid three times. This

PYROZIDE POWDER contains special ingredients that give needed stimulation to gums that are easily irritated or are losing their healthy firmness. It is medicated with Dentinol, which promotes healing.

The effectiveness of this remedial dentifrice in allaying irritated gums has been demonstrated for years in dental clinics. Regular brushing with Pyrozide Powder cleans the teeth thoroughly—removes mucoid acid deposits and the daily secretion of salivary deposits (tartar). It aids in keeping the gums hard and firm.

In taste and action Pyrozide Powder is distinctive and different. The refreshed, cleanly feeling of your mouth for two or more hours after using will convince you that it is superior to any other dentifrice you have ever used.

A full six months' supply is in the economical dollar package. At all drug stores. The Dentinol & Pyrozide Co., Sole Distributors, 1480 Broadway, New York.

was the signal for his wife to be quiet, as she was committing some indiscretion. "Doubtless Houdini used it more than any other signal in our code," says Mrs. Houdini.

Houdini had a novel way of ending petty quarrels. "Whenever I got angry," Mrs. Houdini relates, "he would leave the house and walk slowly around the block. In a few minutes, he would open the door and toss his hat into the room. If it was not thrown out again, he would enter. If the hat was thrown out, he would go away for another few minutes.

"On one occasion my bad temper made me obdurate to Houdini's overture of the hat. He had been putting a new electric bulb in my room for me, and he dropped the bulb, which shattered to bits on the floor. I upbraided him severely for his carelessness. He got a second bulb, and in his agitation this also slipped from his fingers and was smashed. With that I treated him to an unbridled outburst, and he hastily left the house. After some minutes, according to his custom, he cautiously slipped the door open and tossed his hat in. This performance was repeated several times, with intervals between. Then he vanished for an hour. At the end of that time a messenger appeared with an envelope, on which this legend was typewritten: 'To be delivered in a Hurry to Mrs. Houdini, then Exit Rapidly.' Within were these formal words:

> Mr. Houdini wishes to inform Mrs. Houdini that first globe fell out of his hand, but the second one slipped. He wishes to convey his sorrow, and promises that the one that fell will never fall again.—Mr. Houdini, Friend Husband.

It was impossible to be angry very long with a husband of that kind."

THE thing that gave Harry Houdini his first lift out of obscurity was a development of the despised handcuff trick, which most of his early audiences gazed upon with such a marked lack of enthusiasm.

There has been much learned discussion —and much nonsensical speculation, in every civilized language—as to how Houdini escaped from handcuffs and prison cells under most abnormal and rigorous conditions. Many persons have explained the mystery by the suggestion that Houdini could compress his knuckles so that they became smaller than his wrists and thus he easily slipped out of the gyves. Houdini cou'd not do that, though it was not for lack of trying, and he maintained from his own experience that it was physically impossible to make one's hand of smaller compass than one's wrist.

From many ordinary handcuffs Houdini could release himself by giving them a blow in a certain spot.

For the more difficult handcuffs he would use his picklock, a refinement of the little instrument he devised while working for the locksmith in Appleton. He could, incidentally, improvise a workable picklock from a bit of wire or a pin or a watch spring. Certain handcuffs he could unlock with the aid of a piece of twine alone. The real key was his profound knowledge of every type of lock and of locking systems. How he managed to operate, with his hands trussed behind him is another matter. There were certain gyves from which he freed himself by sheer dexterity and strength. His exact process of working would be, as he sometimes remarked, a dangerous thing to let loose in any society, even though few persons would have the special skill and knowledge to make use of it.

The little picklock remained with him through most of the tests. The surgeons and detectives, hard-boiled and intent and up to tricks, and not at all delicate in their attentions, would pass their hands over every inch of his body, and probe and explore, but never during all the years of his escapes did any of them find anything on him.

"Sure, I had something on me, a little bit of a thing," he once explained to a friend. "The hiding-place was so easy to see that they always overlooked it."

IT WAS not until the end of 1898, when he was playing a series of obscure engagements in Chicago and environs, that Houdini hit on a scheme for making his police-station stunt more dramatic.

He went about his plans carefully: First he made friends with several newspaper men. Then he secured an introduction to Andy Rohan, lieutenant of detectives and the right-hand man of the chief of police. Houdini took his wife to the city jail to pay a visit to Rohan, and it was her job to keep the rotund and good-natured officer amused while Houdini prowled about and surreptitiously studied the lock system.

After a second visit to Rohan, Houdini told his reporter friends that he could escape from the city jail after letting himself be handcuffed and locked in a cell. Nobody had done anything like that in Chicago before, so that was news. Houdini therefore paid another visit to the jail, this time accompanied by several reporters and a photographer. Rohan was not unaware of the value of reporters, and the stunt pleased him. He assumed that Houdini could not get out, and he was not averse to having that young nuisance make a fool of himself.

Houdini was duly locked up, and in a few minutes he walked into the warden's office, a free man. His reception, however, was disappointing. The reporters had learned, in the interval, of his previous visits to the jail, and assumed that he had taken a wax impression of the locks, had keys made, and merely took them out of his pocket and unlocked the cell door and the corridor exits. There was no magic in that, said the skeptical young men, and it wasn't news.

"Suppose you strip me and search me before you lock me up?" said Houdini.

That sounded more like the real thing, they admitted, and so that was done, and, in addition, at Houdini's suggestion, they sealed his mouth with plaster. His clothes were locked in another cell. So they left him, manacled and stark naked, and within ten minutes he strolled jauntily into Rohan's office with his clothes on. Moreover, he entered the chief's office from the street door. First, he had let himself out of the jail and dashed over to his wife at their lodgings, to cry "Success! Success!" By that time quite a crowd had assembled in the chief's quarters, and all of them, especially Andy Rohan, were impressed and astounded.

The real thrill, however, came the next morning. Houdini burst into the room

(he always burst in; he could never come in quietly) waving a sheaf of newspapers and shouting, "Bess! Bess! I'm famous! Look at my picture in the papers!"

THIS was the real beginning of Houdini's public jail breaking. Thereafter, he escaped from the principal jails in many cities. His collection of certificates from the police and municipal authorities covers most of the larger cities from San Francisco to Moscow. In his demonstrations there was not a single failure.

Sometimes the task was a tough one, even for him. On a number of occasions he emerged with his limbs swollen or bleeding, and concealing his exhaustion as best he could.

One of his most strenuous escapes was made in one of the larger California cities, during his first trip to the coast, not long after he surprised Andy Rohan. On this occasion, after stripping Houdini, the chief of police had him locked in a cell with four pairs of handcuffs on his arms, shackles to his legs, and one leg encased in an Oregon boot, a fifty-five-pound leg iron that had no key and worked by a combination lock.

After Houdini had escaped from these complicated shackles, the chief of police who had submitted to the test with reluctance, issued the following formal and not very complimentary public statement:

Should Houdini turn out to be a criminal, I would consider him a very dangerous man, and I suggest that the various officers throughout the United States remember his appearance, in case of future emergency.

Once, and once only, Houdini failed to get out of a handcuff. It was shortly before the Andy Rohan incident, while he was filling an engagement at Middleton's museum in Chicago. A detective locked him in a pair of cuffs that completely baffled him. He worked over those shackles vainly for over an hour, until the audience began to jeer him.

"Do you give up, Houdini?" asked the detective.

"No," replied Houdini, resolutely.

"Well," said the detective, "I might as well tell you that cuff don't open. I fixed a slug in it and it won't unlock."

After that Houdini was more wary. He first locked and unlocked every cuff brought to him.

(To be continued)

"IF YOU can get loose from the Scotland Yard shackles, I'll sign you," said an English theatre manager to the young and ambitious Houdini. The magician easily freed himself, and then began his rise to world-wide fame. He escaped from fetters and from jails in most of the countries in Europe. Stripped stark naked and searched, he was locked in a Russian prison cage. There was no key to unlock the cage this side of Siberia; but Houdini needed no key. To the astonishment of the Czar's police, he got out! This and many other adventures of the great magician are related in the third article concerning him, which will appear next month. These are thrilling stories—you will enjoy them vastly!

Your Mistakes in English STAND OUT!

YOU can not hide your mistakes in English—they stand out sharply, giving others an unfortunate impression of you. You may not make such glaring errors as "He don't," "You was," "I ain't." But perhaps you may make other mistakes which offend the ears of cultured people, and cause them to judge you unfairly.

No one will correct your mistakes in English. People are too polite. They fear you will feel insulted, and unconsciously you keep on making the same mistakes. And, though you may think your English is good, it may be dotted with errors which others notice, and which destroy many of your opportunities for advancement.

What Can You Do?

For many years Sherwin Cody studied the problem of creating the habit of using good English. After countless experiments, he finally invented a simple method by which you can acquire a better command of the English language in only 15 minutes a day.

Under old methods rules are memorized, but correct habits are not formed. Soon the rules themselves are forgotten. The new Sherwin Cody method provides, on the contrary, for the formation of correct habits by constantly calling attention only to the mistakes you make—and then showing you the right way so that correct English soon becomes "second nature." Already over 50,000 people have used this method with the most marked results.

he repeated. "Isn't that quite enough?"

"But she's done that right along," I protested.

"Oh no, not like this," said Will. "You don't understand. She doesn't talk about anything else. And she never stops talking—just goes on and on and on. And about nothing on earth but her sicknesses and nobody coming to see her. You can't get her off the subject. Why, it isn't healthy to be around with anyone like that. You don't understand."

I just stood there and stared at Will. And I understood better than I ever have in my life before why women feel superior to men. There stood Will, telling me exactly what I'd been telling him for months. Telling it to me as though it were something new that he had just discovered! And as a last straw, telling me that I didn't understand!

I never wanted to laugh so much in my life; but fortunately I didn't. He would have taken it as a sign of a callous nature that wasn't able even to comprehend his sufferings. Instead, I just stood still. And in the silence, something came to me. They talk about the voice of inspiration, and now I believe it. Something certainly guided me. I heard my own voice talking, as though it came from somebody else and I had no control over it.

"It's too bad you feel that way about it," my voice said sympathetically, "because Kathie's going to be at Mother's for two or three weeks on her way back from Elmer's, and I'll want to be over there all I possibly can. I don't like leaving you here with Cousin Effie; but if she drops in—"

"Something," said Will, "has got to be done to stop this dropping in."

"But we promised the folks we'd look out for her," I heard the sympathetic voice going on. "It would kill your mother if we weren't nice to Cousin Effie."

"We'll look out for her and we'll be nice to her," said Will; "but something's got to be done to stop this dropping in."

AND then he said, as one voicing an absolutely new idea for the first time, "She must be trying for you at times."

Now, I ask you!

I went to bed that night happier than I'd been since Mother and Father Horton had been away. Suddenly, Cousin Effie had become just a problem for Will and me to solve. No longer, something that, in a queer sort of way, came between us, that made me hurt and angry at him. Of course it was really funny, the way it had happened; but, as every happily married woman knows, you don't mind a husband being funny. They all are in one way or another.

It's queer how, just knowing that, as far as Will was concerned, I was free to do anything that seemed best about Cousin Effie, kept her from seeming such a nightmare to me. I guess what had made it seem so frightfully important had been the feeling that he didn't understand. Whenever I'd think of it now, I'd think of Will standing there and telling me that I didn't understand and, instead of feeling hurt and mad, I'd nearly double up with laughing. Why, days went on, and I never worried a minute.

Of course I did hope that she wouldn't appear on Friday noon, but, as I hadn't mentioned that I was going to have company, there was a sporting chance that she wouldn't.

I was having a very fancy lunch on Friday. Not my own crowd at all. Some of the Harvester bunch. Betty Bartell and Mrs. Prentice, and Mrs. Jackson and her sister, and Mrs. Curtis, whose husband is the president of the J. C. Harvester. They are all from Chicago and are the really swanky crowd of Montrose. Of course our own crowd is the good old families, and there's nothing slow about us; but the Harvester crowd keeps maids and all that, and is much more high-stepping. There's always a certain amount of mixing of crowds in Montrose of course, and I'd been invited enough with the Harvester bunch so that it was up to me to entertain them.

Will would not come home for dinner that day; Rosie was going to take the babies for me; and I was going to pull a really good party. I had white roses for the table in my black glass bowl and white candles in my black glass candlesticks, and had planned a marvelous menu, if I do say it, myself. Hominy, baked crusty, with Parmesan cheese (which I got out of a magazine, and which I don't believe anybody in Montrose had ever served instead of potatoes), and ripe olives stuffed with almonds, which are about the last word.

I WAS so excited with my plans that I didn't even think about Cousin Effie. And then, just as I was slicing the veal loaf and putting bits of parsley around the platter, I glanced out the side kitchen window. There, coming down the street, were the gray cravenette coat and gray feather hat.

Some way, it didn't bother me at all. I figured that I could, if necessary, tell Cousin Effie that I'd just have to ask her to run along to-day and come some other time. This would be a good lesson to her, and might even stop her from dropping in another time. And Will wouldn't mind my having done it. It's a great comfort to realize that your husband will really understand.

I listened for that deprecating little tap-tap at the door with perfect calm. In a minute or two, of course I heard it, and then Cousin Effie's plaintive little "Anybody home?"

I came in from the kitchen, my big rubber apron on over my new black chiffon-velvet afternoon dress, perfectly poised and calm, feeling comfortably, easily, able to deal with the situation. I said, "Hello, there," in a brisk, friendly voice. Then I met Cousin Effie's eyes.

Every bit of poise and calm and briskness drained right out of me. There was no mistaking the expression in Cousin Effie's eyes. She knew I didn't want her.

Queer I had never understood that look before, that slow, gray, quiet way she always came along the street; that soft, deprecating tap at the door, the way she always came sidling into the house. She had always known I didn't want her!

I simply can't explain what recognizing that look did to me. All the hours that Cousin Effie had spent talking to me about her sicknesses and her troubles, I had pretended to be sympathetic, while I had just been bored. This was different. It was as though I was suddenly standing there in her place, myself, in a shabby gray coat and hat, old and alone in the world, driven by the terrible emptiness and loneliness of my own life into going to see even someone who didn't care for me. Tapping softly, apologetically, because I knew I wasn't wanted.

Maybe it was Cousin Effie's own fault that she wasn't wanted anywhere. Maybe most of all of our troubles are our own fault, if we only had sense enough to see it. But suddenly that didn't make any difference. I was sorry for her. For the first time I saw that she was just a poor, old, lonely woman.

Honestly, I get disgusted with myself—I'm so weak. There I had had everything decided. I had made up my mind with perfect calm and poise just what I ought to do. And I couldn't do it. For several minutes I struggled with myself. I tried to hang on to my brisk, sensible suggestion. But it was hopeless. It was like trying to keep your balance when a rug is being pulled out from under you. Why, I couldn't even make that important luncheon seem important.

And then Cousin Effie cinched it. She held out a pasteboard box to me.

"I baked some rolls this morning," she said, "and I brought you over some. They're wrapped up in a napkin so they'll stay hot for dinner."

I DO admire people with strong characters, but there's just no use pretending I've got one. I haven't. All my wise, sensible decision went down with a crash. I was perfectly disgusted with myself, and I couldn't do a thing about it. My voice began to talk as though I had no control over it. I told Cousin Effie I was so glad she'd come, that it was the sweetest thing in the world for her to have brought those rolls—that I was having company for lunch, and didn't have a thing but ordinary baker's bread; those rolls would just make the luncheon, and that she was too dear for anything to have brought them. Desperately, unreasoningly, I heard myself trying to make it up to her for the rotten deal she'd had in life—going on like a perfect weak fool:

"You're just in time, too, Cousin Effie. Nonsense! Of course you'll stay and have lunch with us. Mercy, one more won't make any difference. I don't care if I haven't got a seventh goblet; I can use one of the ordinary glasses, nobody'll notice the difference— No, it won't hurt the looks of the table one bit—and what do we care, anyway? They're just some of the Harvester crowd."

There I was, rushing around, upsetting the table arrangement, completely ruining the effect, actually taking off Cousin Effie's coat and hat by main force. I knew I was just making a lot of trouble for myself in the future. I knew I was a complete and utter fool, and I didn't give a rap!

The funny part of it was that those rolls of Cousin Effie's did just make the luncheon. I had only been trying to make her happy when I'd said they would. And then, they actually did! They were simply wonderful rolls. Whole wheat, each one folded over a bit of butter and a sprinkle of cinnamon, and baked crisp and crusty on the outside, and light as air.

Mrs. Curtis simply raved about them, and, Mrs. Jackson's husband being Mrs. Curtis's husband's assistant, so did Mrs. Jackson. In fact, they all did. Nobody even mentioned the hominy and Parmesan cheese, or the stuffed ripe olives.

"I don't know what's the matter with the hired girls these days," Mrs. Curtis said. "If you ask them to make a bit of homemade bread, they act as though you'd insulted them." Mrs. Curtis has a perfectly gorgeous home and is the only person in town who keeps three servants; yet she's got that funny old-fashioned streak that won't let her call them maids. "I lost two girls by making an issue of it, and then, when I got one who was willing, she couldn't learn to make anything fit to eat. I just gave up the ghost after that, and we haven't had anything but baker's trash for years. My, these are like the rolls my mother used to make." She took her fourth. "Only better," she added honestly. "Mother never used cinnamon."

It's funny, I don't believe Cousin Effie had had a compliment in years. She got all red and pleased, like a girl that's just had a boy friend bring her her first box of candy.

"My stars," she said, actually flustered, "I can't see why any girl would mind baking a few rolls now and then. Why, bread is the easiest thing in the world to make."

"That's just what Mother always used to say," said Mrs. Curtis.

I got into a conversation then with Mrs. Jackson and her sister, and I didn't hear all that was going on between Mrs. Curtis and Cousin Effie; but in the scraps I did hear—incredible as it may seem—Cousin Effie was still talking about baking. I didn't hear so much as a preliminary symptom mentioned!

THAT night Will was very pessimistic when I told him what I'd done.

"But it really turned out all right," I assured him.

"Maybe it did for this time," said Will; "but what about next time? And next? How'll you like it if she puts in an appearance next Thursday, or whenever it is we're going to have the Kirsteds and play off the Five Hundred score?"

It actually shocked me to hear Will talking so callously. I didn't remember at the time that that was pretty much the way I had talked up to to-day. I tried to explain to him what had happened that had made me feel different; but the trouble was that really nothing had happened.

"Of course I'm sorry for her too," he said, "and we want to do the right thing by her. But that doesn't mean that we want her dropping in on us all the time."

It was very queer. Anyone hearing us would have thought Cousin Effie was my relative that I was sticking up for. I didn't blame Will, but I couldn't get away from the feeling that he didn't really understand. However, we dropped the subject and, to my relief, Cousin Effie didn't appear the night we had the Kirsteds. She didn't come the next Sunday either. In fact, it was nearly two weeks before I saw Cousin Effie again. Then I ran into her in the bakery.

To my amazement, she was ordering a hundred-pound sack of flour.

"Merciful powers!" I exclaimed. "When do you ever expect to use up a hundred pounds of flour all by yourself?"

Cousin Effie beamed.

"I'm baking rolls to sell," she said. "Isn't that funny? You know, the day after your party I baked up a couple of dozen as a little surprise present for Mrs. Curtis. She was so pleased it was very touching. And after a while, she hemmed and hawed around, and finally asked me if I'd be insulted if she asked me to bake her some every week, and let her pay me for them. Insulted! She can't have been brought up right, for all her money. There's nothing insulting about honest work. I said of course I would. And then Mrs. Jackson said she would like to get some regularly too, and Mrs. Jackson's sister. It seems that really good homemade bread of any kind is practically impossible to buy."

I told Will about it at supper a little triumphantly, to show him that, anyway, my moment of weakness had had one good result. Not that there was anything so wonderful, of course, about Cousin Effie selling a few rolls, only that she seemed pleased about it and she had so few things to be pleased about.

THE funny thing, though, was the way that baking those few rolls grew. They really were wonderful rolls, and it must be that everyone who tasted one at Mrs. Curtis's, or Mrs. Jackson's, ran right down to Cousin Effie's and put in an order for herself.

Why, inside of six weeks, Cousin Effie had so many regular customers that she had to hire two high-school girls to help her Saturdays. She charged ten cents a dozen more than the bakery too, so that she really made money on them.

It suddenly dawned on me, one day, quite some time later, that she hadn't dropped in on us for such a long time that I felt conscience-smitten. I called up and invited her to come over to supper that very night. She seemed very pleased and said she'd have been glad to come, but that she'd had a special order for a luncheon the next day, and she'd got to stay home and set her dough that night. Her voice sounded awfully apologetic, too.

"I don't want you and Will to think I'm neglecting you, Dottie," she said, "but I've been so busy. If I've said to myself once I've said a hundred times, 'I must drop in on those children;' but I'm never just ready to start that somebody doesn't call up or drop in to order some rolls or something, and likely as not they stay and chat till it's too late."

"How are you feeling?" I asked, anxiously. "You mustn't overdo and get sick, you know."

"Oh, I'm feeling fine," she answered absently, as though she hadn't time to be bothered by a little thing like dyspepsia. "I'm branching out in doughnuts. I want to talk to Will—he has such good business judgment—and see what he thinks about my taking in Mattie Whittaker to help me. I had a call just yesterday from the Verblen Country Club to ask if I could make them six deep-dish apple pies for a special party they're having next week."

"Well, wouldn't that knock you for a goal!" Will exclaimed when I told him about it that night.

"And she said," I went on excitedly, "that she hopes not to have you send her a monthly check much longer."

Honestly, it's been like a fairy story on a small and very businesslike scale. She went a few days later to see Will at the office about ordering some tin boxes to send things out in. And when I saw her in at Nat's, the end of the next week, I actually didn't know her at first. I thought I heard her voice, but I was so used to looking for that old gray cravenette coat and gray feather hat that at first I didn't recognize her. Cousin Effie had on a nice-looking new blue dress with an almost stylish-looking blue hat. She looked at least ten years younger. She was getting a special price on eggs, on account of using so many.

She was awfully glad to see me, and was more apologetic than ever.

"I promise you that I positively will drop in on you some day this week," she said. "My going to Will's office the other day, you know, was just because I was in such a hurry that I didn't have time to come clear up to your house. It wasn't that I didn't want to see you too. You know that."

She leaned over and patted my hand.

"You know, my dear, I'm not the kind of person who thinks all in-laws are a nuisance. Why, I couldn't be fonder of you if you were a real relative instead of just my second cousin's wife."

the road there were further distributions to many others, especially to the old, the sick, little children. The last quart of wild whortleberries, the Colonel's favorite fruit, he bestowed on a crippled oar-maker who lived on the outskirts of the village. . . . Long after nightfall, whistling an old love-tune, his buggy empty, his waiting supper cold, the Colonel drove into his yard. . . .

What a man's worth is in this world depends on the kind of wake he leaves behind him as he passes. If my Colonel came home in a material way empty-handed, it was because he had "bestowed all his goods to feed the poor." His riches consisted not on what he brought with him but on what he left behind him. He had the superb gift of making other people happy, a power that makes all others appear insignificant. His compassion was sensitive, restless, constructive.

Of his many charities, all of which were bestowed as obscurely and as surreptitiously as possible, the most remarkable that ever came to my attention was that which he showed to poor Amos Brown, a negro who was taken down with a virulent case of smallpox. The local medical authorities had him removed to a deserted cabin far away in the heart of the lost pinewood, sending to nurse him another negro who, having recently recovered

Ease up with the Vim-Ray

MR. FOREST C. DENNIS (RASTUS) of the Rufus and Rastus Radio Team says: "The Vim-Ray has been the means of invigorating us after the nerve-wracking hours before the microphone. There is no question but that it is a marvelous soother and relief for fatigue."

Living is a strenuous business these days—the successful man drives himself to the limit—the busy housewife crowds her day with the business of home-keeping, and even our play, either social relaxation or sports, is apt to add to the nervous tension of our lives.

Nervous troubles, neuritis, sciatica, lumbago, rheumatism—even momentary rigid and aching muscles are all too common—most of them because we just won't ease up—either in work or play.

The Vim-Ray quiets that nagging grind of the neuritic shoulder and arm. Sciatica's stabbing, unbearable pain dies down under its heat. The irritating "cold in the head" yields to it.

Vim-Ray is just heat and you can get its easing-up benefits for from the dread plague, was considered immune. I was told that a physician paid one or two perfunctory visits; but the plight of the stricken man was desolate in the extreme. It would probably have been hopeless had not my Colonel daily, in secret, turned off the plantation road to drive down the grass-grown cattle track toward the cabin in the woods. Nearly a mile from it, he would have to leave his buggy, simply because there was no more road. The rest of the way he would walk through the humid, snake-haunted woods. One day he would take broth to the patient, then pieces of ice carefully wrapped in newspaper to keep from melting in the fierce midsummer sun, now fruit that he had bought with the quarter which was supposed to purchase his own week's supply of cheroots. Quite frequently he left with Amos the luncheon that had been packed for himself.

After a few cheering words with the sick man, and after certain quiet admonitions to the caretaker, admonitions rendered tenfold strong by the accompanying gift of the old gentleman's very last dime, utterly oblivious to the downright beauty and valor of all this behavior, the Colonel would retrace his steps to the waiting buggy, climb in, a little tired, and drive on to the plantation, where his negro workmen, never sure when he would come, would be making the best of a chance to rest.

That my Colonel made these perilous visits to the afflicted negro no one would ever have known, save for Amos Brown himself, who said to me one day, in a good negro's humble and direct fashion, "If de Cunnel had not 'membered Amos in his trouble, dere wouldn't be no Amos to-day."

ANOTHER negro, Joe Vandross by name, had been friends with the Colonel since boyhood days. They were of the same age; and by one of those chances of human nature that must ever remain for us more or less mysterious, they were just born congenial. Their affectionate comradeship grew during more than seventy years. I saw it come beautifully into flower during those last months, when both Joe and the Colonel began to fail very fast. Joe lived about a mile away, making his home with a son, a negro minister, and a good minister too. It was a long walk for Joe in those last weeks, and a long ride for the old Colonel. But, as if aware of a parting soon to come, they let no day go by without seeing each other.

The Colonel always scrupulously gave Joe half the medicine that the doctor had prescribed for his white patient, showing a quaint and impatient disregard of the fact that their ailments were of entirely different natures. He seemed to take the attitude that medicine, affectionately bestowed, will be certain to work a cure. How often I used to see these old friends sitting together, talking, walking together, lingering together at the gateway!

Down to the very last Gate these old comrades went hand-in-hand. When Joe was buried in the plantation graveyard, my Colonel read out of the Prayer Book the stately service over the dead.

During this painful ceremony, his voice never faltered; but I saw him blink suspiciously once or twice, and when he turned away as it was over, he blew his nose rather loudly, although he had no cold.

Many things about life I learned from my Colonel, not the least of which was this: That the deepest and truest affection and comradeship may exist between an aboriginal African and the proud yet humble descendant of English Cavaliers and French Huguenots; between the son of a slave, the grandson of a savage, and the grandson of a Signer of the Declaration of Independence. Father taught me, by his behavior, that, while equality is often impossible, brotherhood never is.

A GREAT lover of children, the Colonel was also, in a most inoffensive way, a keen matchmaker; and there was hardly a real romance in his community in which his genial and serene influence had not been felt. But he was at his best in conciliating young couples who had quarreled. I have heard happily married people, with homes established now for more than thirty years, say, "If the Colonel had not made us settle that quarrel, we never could have made it up."

This wholesome interference on the part of the Colonel had a profound effect on the whole community. To bring about one happy marriage is really a triumph, and he achieved scores. Nor was the least detail beneath his attention. I remember what he said one day to a beautiful Titian-haired girl out in the woods who stopped him to ask him please to bring her from the store a red ribbon, "The same kind you got me last winter," she added.

"Margaret," he said, with becoming gravity, "if you don't mind, I'll bring you blue. It's more becoming to you; besides," he added, his eyes twinkling with understanding and affection, "I happen to know that Jack likes blue better."

Who could resist his charm?

Once or twice I knew him to exert himself slightly to disinterest young people in each other. "But a man has to be very careful about that sort of business," he told me; "the trouble is, you never really know how the thing will turn out. Some of the supposedly worst marriages have turned out to be the happiest. Marriage is largely a matter of adjustment; and the fact is that some unpromising people are uncommonly good adjusters, whereas some of the finest people you ever saw aren't adjustable at all. And the dickens of it is that you can't always tell the degree of adjustability until marriage, which is the test supreme and irrevocable. I like to help matches along, but I hate to break them up. Besides, young people have a certain wisdom in these matters, a certain intuition perhaps, that moves in an orbit just a little outside our own sagacity, old as we are."

A lover of the wild greenwood, my Colonel drew many deep and permanent truths from the earth. He found God in Nature because he found Him in truth and beauty everywhere. The Colonel always seemed aware of the lavish life-giving power of the serene Mother of us all; and, loving her, he came to love all ancient, elemental, enduring things. I remember one day when we were riding the springtime woods together, and had paused to marvel over certain miraculously tall and deep-purple wood violets. He said, "I used to see these violets here

BERRYLOID

THE HIGH LUSTER LACQUER FOR MOTOR CARS AND AIRPLANES

Why some cars always look new Durable beauty is the rare quality that distinguishes Berryloid. It won't rub off!

Its luster is improved by the very things that destroy the life and brilliance of most finishes.

This is why motor cars protected with Berryloid retain their showroom splendor after long periods of exposure and hard service.

Shabby cars will disappear when all cars are protected with finishes as durable as Berryloid.

Today Berryloid is supreme in the air. It is used by nearly every commercial airplane manufacturer. Exhaustive tests and repeated experiences have proved its undeniable superiority for aeronautical purposes.

It will pay to have your car finished with this permanent high-luster lacquer. It costs no more than less durable quality and saves the expense of continual refinishing.

when I was a boy. They die; but, in their way, they rise again. Do you know the only thing we have which defies the years? There's a kind of love that takes, even from the fatal touch of time, which corrodes all else, a new and beautiful luster. That there should be this affection in our mortal world is a miracle of major importance. Indeed, I think it a proof of the spark of divinity in our natures."

Owning a vast place, he had every reason to expect that trespassers and poachers would visit his property. But really he was not much troubled. The negroes of a considerable district he permitted to trap foxes, wildcats, and raccoons, and to gather what firewood they wanted.

But such was the peculiar hold that he had on the hearts of hunters of the pinelands through his humanity to them and to their families that, year after year, they paid him the incredibly affectionate tribute of not killing his deer.

But there came a winter when strange guns began to sound in his beloved woods. The first time the Colonel heard the shots blaring, he was inclined to overlook the trespass; but the second and third times that the offense was committed, though he rode valiantly out after the offenders, he could not apprehend them. Yet they had done sore damage, and had done it in a way to touch the Colonel nearest his heart: they had shot a deer and crippled it. He saw the poor thing limp into the unavailing shelter of a myrtle thicket. The very next day, sounding out brazenly on the wide stillness of the sleeping plantation, he heard the guns again.

THIS time he was thoroughly aroused. As he left the house, the servants heard him mutter in just provocation that somebody would pay for this. My mother tried to catch him, to ask him to wait until after dinner, which was then almost ready. The Colonel shared with most country husbands the disconcerting habit of vanishing just as a meal was about to be served. But, righteous resentment giving him speed, he was on his horse and away before anyone could stay him. The manner in which he sat his horse and the martial air of his advance boded ill for wrongdoers. It was with this same direct and fearless spirit that he had helped to rally his men on that field of carnage before Burnside's Bridge, and had led them desperately on the slopes of Mary's Heights. If now his heart would only continue as stern as his bearing, all would be well!

The second act of our little comedy opens a half-hour later. The scene is the noble live-oak avenue, through the vista of which the visitor sees the glimmering white pillars of the Colonel's ancient ancestral home. Down the avenue, four men are now walking toward the house. The Colonel is leading his sorrel horse, which had not greatly shared in the warlike excitement of his master. Beside the Colonel are three poachers, and the four of them are chatting gayly. At a certain bent oak along the avenue, the old gentleman halts them and points out a deer-crossing of uncommon fame, since there he has made five double shots on stags.

Now they come onward toward the house; the Colonel deftly drops his bridle rein over a post beside the mounting block, and the four walk up the wide steps to the spacious and beautiful veranda. Here, courteously excusing himself for a moment, telling his guests to mark how high the yellow jasmine vine has climbed one of the pillars, the Colonel hurries into the house.

"My dear," he says to his wife, "I've brought these gentlemen home to dinner with us; there are three of them. Hadn't we better use the silver coffee service? Why," he explains, when his wife asks him if these are the poachers, "we could hardly call them that. They are gentlemen, you see. I knew it the minute I saw them. They did happen to get across my line; but they are from the North, and all this is new country to them. But they were most polite. Besides, we can hardly call guests poachers. I am quite charmed with them, and I know that they will be with you. Yes, they are the same men who have been hunting here for the past week, but they are members of the Oakwood Club. We must be hospitable to them."

Gallant, tender heart! You were never made for stern reprisals. You gestured at being severe with those who wronged you, but your arm, raised to strike, yielded to the nobler instinct to embrace!

I do not know whether those of painfully worldly mind would approve the Colonel's manner of disciplining offenders. Probably not. But, though utterly naïve and ingenuous, his plan of entertaining the very men he had sworn to punish bore gracious fruits. In the long run, a man cannot lose by courtesy. After that day, those three hunters would rather have died the death than have hunted without permission on the Rutledge property; and the Colonel himself became a frequent and a beloved guest at the famous Oakwood Club.

THERE'S an ancient Cavalier lyric which tells us that, under mountains, over rivers, and seas, through dark caves, over sheer and perilous barriers, Love will find a way. It is the one true magic in life. It is the one force upon the constant use of which Christ insisted, with reiterated pleadings almost pathetic. And no one with any experience of life will be ready to deny that, compared to the supernal power of love, all other powers are mean and insignificant. It makes Hate look paltry. Having all the dreadful might of gentleness, Love has all the quiet conquering way of some living thing eternal. He who employs this force to effect his purposes, as Colonel Rutledge did without design, will have the stars and the sun with him. All beauty and all virtue will be for him. God will be ever at his side. I think the real secret of the charm of the Colonel's personality was a simple one: he had the priceless gift of a loving heart.

The main traffic of life is, after all, with one's own spirit; and if it be gentle and affectionate, how can the journey be aught but joyous?

The Colonel was wholly genuine. His title he had come by through four years of battle-strife. With very little persuasion he would tell you about the war; and, of course, there was but one war to him. Though he bore two wounds, and though I treasure the gray homespun coat that was his—a coat with that patch over the breast where the bullet tore its way through, and the ragged collar with half the stars shot away, he was totally free from any taint of bitterness or of self-pity. After all his fighting in Virginia, he returned home to a ruined estate and a collapsed civilization. Yet I never heard him speak of President Lincoln save with considerate and kindly judgment. "To the brave men on both sides," I used often to hear him say, lifting his glass for a toast, "to the brave men who fought, and to the braver women who waited." And to him Gettysburg was ever the greatest disaster in history.

BEHIND him was a depth and richness of background utterly lacking to most men who bear his title. He had known intimately both Lee and Jackson. He told me that, one night of rain and fog, on the dreary and deadly ramparts in front of the trenches at Petersburg, a cloaked figure had suddenly appeared to him out of the mist. It was General Lee. Together they stood talking in the steady downpour; talking of the war, of the coming battle, of those fallen, of those left behind. On leaving, the General said: "I hope your men are well sheltered, Colonel. Keep them dry if you can, and give them extra rations." More than a mile back to his headquarters Lee walked in the rain.

The Colonel told me that he had seen Custer at Appomattox: "A most romantic figure," he said, "with fire and dash; extraordinary flowing curls; the most picturesque man I ever saw, save only Pickett. Jackson, if you did not know who he was, you might laugh at, for he was awkward and looked far more like a preacher than a soldier. But if you knew him, you'd worship him. Lee, of course, was supreme. I do not know that the war ruined the South; for it gave her Lee."

In 1918 he visited me in the North and I drove him down to the battlefield of Antietam, which he had not seen since those woeful September days of 1862. The guide took us to the tower overlooking the historic field, and pointed out to us the maneuvers of the troops on both sides, naming the commanders, and describing the fighting. "Just over yonder," he said at last, "the Twenty-fifth North Carolina regiment was bloodily engaged. It was commanded by the gallant Colonel Henry Middleton Rutledge, the youngest colonel in the Confederate Army. He was badly wounded in this battle."

Father took off his hat and bowed to the guide: "Colonel Rutledge," he said, "and at your service, sir."

I might add that, after Antietam, upon Lee's recrossing the Potomac under the fire of sharpshooters, the Colonel would undoubtedly have lost his life but for the intrepid devotion of his negro body servant, who attended him throughout the war. The negro had gone ahead, and had reached the Virginia shore, when Father, exhausted by his wound and by the onset of an attack of typhoid, fainted, and fell from his horse into the stream. Under the deadly fire of the Federals, the negro went back, lifted the Colonel's senseless form, and bore him in safety to the friendly shore. Whenever I hear anyone speak disparagingly of negro character, I remember that incident.

That same body-servant, within a few years, became the fortunate recipient of a pension from the United States Government. An agent canvassed all the able-bodied negro men to discover whether any were eligible for pensions. As the agent worked on commission, he was not vitally interested in the legitimacy of the claimant's case. Father's body-servant assured the investigator that he had been in the war, omitting only the slight detail of which army he had been in. The agent accepted the negro's "I been fightin' wid Mas' Henry" as sufficient proof of the man's eligibility to a stipend. Father was secretly delighted, and never told his faithful servitor of the dubious nature of the business. The pension came in regularly. At length the negro's wife died. He married a young mulatto; and she to-day, a widow, draws a pension from the United States Government because her husband served four years in the Confederate Army! Many a pension is fearfully and wonderfully made.

In the Battle of the Wilderness, the Colonel captured, after a strenuous personal encounter, a Federal officer—a giant of a man named Olaf Svenson, a Swede, with typical blue eyes and yellow hair. Captor and captive became friendly.

"Where is your home?" asked Father.

"Minnesota," Svenson responded.

The Colonel was astounded.

"Why, man," he exclaimed, incredulous, "we aren't fighting the Northwest!"

This incident has always seemed to me a most interesting illustration of the South's failure to comprehend that she was fighting, not New England alone but the whole of the vast region north of the Line.

MY COLONEL kept open house for travelers; and as his home was near one of the ancient parish highways, there was seldom a time when he was not entertaining someone. "I like to have somebody to look after," he would say.

We children in time became established in life; but one or two always managed to be visiting in the old home. After a long absence, I returned for a visit. Father always called me "Benjamin," because I was the youngest son. From repeated experiences, I was fully prepared to have the Colonel give me the ancestral watch, which, as long as I could remember, had been presented to me every time I came home, and always again on the eve of my departure. And, as often as I received it, I would carefully and secretly lay it back in the little top drawer of Father's mahogany dresser, knowing quite well how sorely the good old gentleman would really miss it if it were gone; knowing, also, that the ancient timepiece, too old to run accurately, was truly invaluable as a gift that could be repeatedly presented, accepted with the solemn gratitude due the possession of an heirloom, and returned faithfully. This whole performance had taken on the grave precision of a religious rite.

On the evening of my arrival one Christmas, after supper was over and the family had gathered before the ample hearth for reminiscences, I saw my father disappear into the bedroom, with the air of one about to spring a joyous surprise. I of course thought that the familiar watch was forthcoming.

But when Father reëntered the room,

LEARN TO WRITE WRITE TO EARN

"Genius itself must learn the machinery of expression."

Rupert Hughes

"SINCE authorship is essentially a matter of home work," says Rupert Hughes, biographer of George Washington: The Human Being and the Hero, "it is one of the few arts that can be taught by correspondence. The Palmer Institute, under the presidency of so eminent a literary artist as Clayton Hamilton, and as conducted by Frederick Palmer and his associates, is qualified to render invaluable aid in the art and business of authorship."

Palmer training is uniquely personal. It can develop that talent of yours until you, too, can write the kind of stories that tug at heart strings . . . that grip the imagination . . . that editors buy.

and had to walk along dark, heavily traveled roads, no motor-car would ever tackle me for a loss. Because I'd carry a lighted flashlight so that all drivers could see me . . . in time!

And because it would be my life to guard, I'd take no chances on just-any-old-batteries. They would have to be genuine Eveready, ever-ready and ever-dependable, crammed and jammed with life and light.

Get the flashlight habit. It pays. And that's no "light" fiction!

carrying in his hands a somewhat dilapidated matchbox, I could not imagine what kind of heirloom would be so lightly regarded as to be made to repose in such a receptacle.

There is a type of momentous yet pleasing gravity which sportsmen assume when they discuss sports; and such was the seriousness with which the Colonel approached. With great solicitude, as if he were handling something very brittle, he slid off the cover and placed tenderly in my hands the matchbox. It was packed to the brim with damp white sand!

"Benjamin," said the Colonel, pulling up a chair close to me, adjusting his glasses, and laying one hand on my knee, "it was just like this: I simply could not bear not to have you see that track."

THEN for the first time I noticed, in the center of the small block of wet sand, the track of a buck. Deeply the heavy stag had set the imprint of his hoof in the damp earth.

"I was driving home from the mail," the old gentleman explained, now fairly launched on his story, "when just this side of Bowman's Bank, where that little scrub-oak hill is, I saw this track in the road. It was so fresh that it was almost smoking. I don't think the deer could have been gone a half-hour. As you know, I always put out every deer track that I see, not caring to have any of the pineland hunters take too deep an interest in them. But I just felt as if you had to have this track. Your mother had told me to buy a box of matches at the store. The Lord will provide! The thing came over me in a flash. Here was my chance to preserve the track for you! Emptying the matches on the floor of the buggy, I turned the opened box down over the track, ran my knife 'round the edges to give me the outline; then, lifting the box, I cut down deeply into the sand, and lifted the block intact. Isn't it the finest track you ever saw? And to think it was made by one of the deer of our home woods!"

The good old man's delight was so unfeigned, and his pride in his singular achievement was so refreshing and ingenuous that no real lover of humanity but would be irresistibly drawn to the ardent author of so quaint and whimsical a performance.

The Colonel was a great lover of flowers, as I have said; and in his own woods nature was lavish in beauty and abundance. I have seen him ride into a bay thicket and break a great fragrant cluster of snowy blooms for his wife. Of the flowers of the garden, he loved the red rose best; for half a century ago his mother used to wear one in her hair. He even went so far in sentiment once as to write a little verse about a rose; but he never showed it to anyone, and barely mentioned it to me, having a deep regard for the sanctity of personal emotions, and a reticence about his own feelings. As he used to ride about the plantation, he was forever reining in his horse to admire the beauty of the cloudy-purple pines, the dazzling faërie work of the hummingbirds, the misty-tender radiance of the blossoming fields. This close association with the loveliness of nature kept him close to God.

Touching matters of a religious nature, he was reverent in a manner almost antique. He had nothing in common with those who say in their hearts that there is no God, for he had passed through many dark waters, and had found Him in their depths. He always said his prayers; though, as he confided to me with real contrition, on very cold nights he was shockingly liable to cut them a bit short. His favorite prayer was that of the Publican, and he often repeated it with comforting sadness.

I have mentioned certain incidents of the relationship of my Colonel Rutledge with the negroes. All of them in his part of the country knew and loved him; and whatever failings negroes may have they are among the most discriminating judges of character I know. At least three dusky families lived entirely on the Colonel's bounty. He built two cabins on his land and furnished them for two ancient negroes; Old Galboa and Old Morris, both of whom had been slaves. All their many descendants had deserted them, but their former master did not.

How often have I sat with my father and Old Galboa under the oaks and pines in front of the negro's cabin, listening fascinated to the talk of these two men, each one a sage in his own way, each devoted to the other. Galboa was both by nature and by circumstances a recluse, but to the Colonel he opened his heart. Formerly the plantation fisherman, he had an almost occult knowledge of wild creatures and their ways. Deep, primeval, was his philosophy, smacking of the very odors of the brown earth and of the forest. I remember him saying, "God is good enough to do anything." His descriptions of things had a certain poetic felicity, unlearned and therefore piquant. I recall his describing a hog as being of "a sort of a kind of brown-ashes color;" and one day, when the Colonel asked him if he had seen a certain wild heifer, Old Galboa said, "No, sah, but I will take a sly look for her."

I REMEMBER how amused I was over an appeal that a much baffled negro bridegroom made to the Colonel. This young man, Alec Jones by name, was a very gentle, respectful fellow; Father had almost reared him, and he had always come, in the most confiding manner, to the old gentleman for advice. About a week after the marriage of Alec to a most buxom and commanding woman, several years his senior and, as she let it be freely known, centuries his superior, the bridegroom, much crestfallen, appeared in the Colonel's back yard. Alec gave unmistakable signs of being in a most painful state of mind. The Colonel at once apprehended the young man's distress, but he had rather a difficult time ascertaining the real nature of the trouble. At last it came out:

"Mas' Henry," asked Alec, fathomless faith in his troubled eyes, "is you know any way for a man to head-off a woman?"

Alec's old friend and benefactor was obliged to confess that even his long experience of life had not enabled him to discover a single method by which a mere man can prevent a woman from having her own way. But he attempted to console Alec by adding, "We men must remember, Alec, that women are generally right."

Nor was this opinion delivered without profound conviction on the Colonel's part.

"How could I talk—with that throat?"

With throat raw and painful this is not an alibi. The wife answers sensibly: "See the doctor tomorrow." And she often adds: "Get a bottle of Formamint at the corner drug store now."

For physicians approve of Formamint. Unlike other remedies, it can be taken all day long—wherever you go.

Carry a bottle of pleasant Formamint tablets with you. Especially in dusty, crowded places. To treat sore throat, one every hour; as a preventive, one every two hours. All druggists.

He reverenced women as no other man of my acquaintance has ever done. I might hazard the conjecture that the high estimate he put upon womankind might account in no small measure for his serenity of spirit and for his popularity.

On one occasion a young negro man was rather disrespectful to the Colonel—a thing so unheard-of that it caused a considerable stir on the plantation, and rumors of it ominously traveled for miles. The negro in question was one Mingo, the son of old Isaac McCoy.

Many were the scathing personal remarks passed on Mingo by the members of his own race, the attacks ranging from animadversions concerning his morals to ridicule of his indubitably peculiar head. But it was reserved for old Isaac, the chagrined father, to make what I have always considered to be the most amusing and unique apology I ever heard. Approaching the Colonel with a certain air of deference yet of ancient wisdom, he said, "I done come for tell you 'bout Mingo. Mas' Henry, you ain't 'zackly understan' my son."

This beginning did not promise an apology, and the Colonel did not look pleased.

"Mas' Henry," old Isaac explained, as if such matters should really be understood by a man of the Colonel's intellectual ascendency, "ain't you know, sah, if eber you see a nigger wid a raccoon head, he ain't got no sense?"

The Colonel melted; old Isaac chuckled. Peace and order were completely restored by this original and magnificent apology.

FATHER was the only man living who could give a negro in that part of the country his genealogy. I used always to get a thrill of genuine pathos when some black man or woman, in perfect trust and confidence, having walked miles out of nowhere, would come to the Colonel, and plead, with appealing and devastating blankness, "Mas' Henry, please, sah, tell me who I is."

"Why," the Colonel would say, "your people, William, came from the old Ormond Hall place. You are the son of Charlie Washington, who died when you were just a little boy. Your mother was Sarah Colleton, and your grandmother was Mamie Weston, who nursed my mother. They were all fine people; you come from the very best stock."

My Colonel's utter humanity was by no means limited by his relations with his fellowmen; it included all living things, especially horses and dogs. On a hot day I have known him to dismount and walk in the sun beside his horse, just to give the poor creature a respite. He was never more boyishly happy than when someone made him a present of a puppy; and as his acquaintance was large, gifts of dogs were so frequent as to come near dislocating the domestic machinery of his home. I can see him now, seated in his favorite rocking chair on his spacious veranda, his right hand hanging down, playing with the prodigious drooping ears of a hound puppy, regaling me with tales of woods and waters. At such times the gentle affection with which his bronzed hand played with the pup was as indicative of his character as the genial light in his clear blue eyes.

One cold January day when Father and I were deer-hunting, I left my stand in the woods and joined him on his, to suggest that we make a little fire, it being better to let a deer escape than to freeze one's self. I found him on a pine log, somewhat huddled by the cold. Seated very close to him was Blue, his favorite old hound, who had apparently wearied of the chase and had rejoined his master. The hound saw my approach, but the good old man did not. Singular indeed was the performance that I beheld, and of a nature so whimsical that I can never recall it without a smile.

The Colonel had carefully unwrapped on the log before him the one precious sandwich that he had for luncheon. This he had scrupulously cut into little squares. In his hand was a tiny silver flask, a few drops of the priceless brandy from which, with the grave precision of a connoisseur, he would pour on the bread. Then he would give old Blue a square, and would take one himself, share and share alike. The hound, looking unfathomable things at me, resented, I think, in his stately fashion, my intrusion upon so personal and solemn an occasion. As I came up, the Colonel said, with a smile:

"Benjamin, an old dog, you know, has to have a little stimulant as well as an old man."

That the singular remedy he gave Blue was efficacious, I am certain; for the hound, rejuvenated, soon rejoined the pack. But the more I think of his secretly leaving his companions, the more I am convinced that not weariness but sweet recollection and anticipation had prompted him. This same performance that I had witnessed had doubtless happened many times before!

SUCH was the man I knew and loved. He is gone. But the memory of him gives life for me—and I believe for many others—an aspect of nobility and grace. My Colonel helps to redeem humanity. They throng back to me—the memories he created; they mingle, they brighten. And in the moonlit, shadowy land of the past I see my beloved Colonel greeting affectionately his roadside neighbors; talking with Old Galboa; visiting the stricken Amos Brown; feeding his luncheon to an old hound; walking with his black friend, Joe Vandross, even to the very grave; giving his son a treasured deer track; rejoicing in Nature's beauty and abundance; ascertaining artfully a somewhat lagging lover's preference for color, and then, with native charm, telling the sweet girl in the wild pinelands to buy a blue ribbon instead of a red one!

IF YOU do not see at least an occasional Sunrise, says ARCHIBALD RUTLEDGE, you are neglecting your spiritual growth. "Each sunrise is to me a promise of immortality," he tells you. "Life awakens again each morning when the brilliantly-colored streams climb into the sky. The heart is purest, the spirit most serene, the world is freshest at sunrise time." A beautiful article, and one full of meaning is Mr. Rutledge's contribution to the next issue of "The American Magazine." It will make your life richer to read "SUNRISE."

advantage, that the audience supplies an inspiration to the artist or speaker, the absence of which unsettles him badly in the old-type broadcasting station.

Singers who are accustomed to face great audiences and who can hear the rap of the maestro's baton in the Metropolitan without a tremor, when they come to stand for the first time before the little "mike" are stricken with terror—what we call "mike fever." They may be in a small room, nobody present but the announcer and an accompanist.

But there stands that little microphone—that "terrible little piece of tin" as Reinald Werrenrath called it. It means nothing in particular if you look at it as a casual observer. But stand before it to broadcast, hear suddenly the click of switches, and the whisper of the announcer, "You're on the air," and a strange, undefinable thrill takes possession of you. It is as if suddenly the walls of the studio had collapsed and you found yourself upon a peak, with the world around its base peering up at you, or as if that little round disk were a crack in the walls of the world, through which you were about to call out to the universe. The thought paralyzes a lot of people because it is all in the imagination, and there is no eager, expectant crowd present to spur them on, nothing but the bare walls of the studio. John McCormack, veteran and easy artist that he is, was in a terrible state on his first appearance.

The artist needs applause. That burst of hand-clapping that comes surging toward him as he is introduced or when he is through is the very food of his soul. And there is no such nourishment in a broadcasting studio. The microphone never smiles or claps or talks back. And the performer never knows whether the crowd out in the air is laughing at him or sneering at him or applauding.

ONE night a Russian pianist was booked to play at our studio. He was greatly troubled at the lack of an audience. There was no "atmosphere" for his artistic soul to splash around in. But he had a happy thought. He asked if we would put out the lights, so that he might play in the dark. Of course his request was granted, and so this player, sitting there in the mystic depths of the darkness, was able to summon up within his soul the inspiration he needed. A few others, I dare say, hearing of this, tried the same experiment. And some others sought the same effect in a dim light rather than darkness. At all events, out of this slender suggestion grew the beautiful studio which has just been put into use.

This studio, which is on the top floor of the fine new building of the National Broadcasting Company, is much like a beautiful concert hall, finished with very high ceilings, from which drop magnificent chandeliers. At one end is a slightly raised platform, large enough to accommodate a symphony orchestra. Up to this point there is nothing out of the ordinary in this fine chamber save its appointments.

But when the artist takes his position at the microphone the change comes: The bulbs of the great chandeliers which flood the chamber with light are extinguished, and the studio is plunged into semi-darkness. The whole space is suffused with a soft, dusky glow from hidden lamps. These lamps are concealed around the rims of the wall panels, and their glow is spread over the surface of the panel. There are nine hundred and eighty-seven of these lamps. The artist standing before the microphone feels, as these light changes take place, something of the thrill he gets from the greeting of his audience, and their expectant flutter as they settle into the hush which precedes the first note of the music.

He begins his number in this soft, warm, rose-colored dusk, and then slowly the glow upon the panels changes to deep purples, and then brighter oranges, and deep, somber blue, and then again into a series of rose tints. Like the incidental music in the movie theatre—the deep, gay, or solemn tones of the organ which underscore the picture—so these color tones of the broadcasting studio pour over the uneasy soul of the artist, warm it, thrill it, and enable him to escape the disconcerting influence of that hard-boiled piece of tin—the remorseless mike.

A GREAT sum has been spent on this studio, which is really only one of nine which the National Broadcasting Company has fitted up in their new quarters. And this leads me to say just a word about a very important feature of broadcasting. Since we were talking about the men behind the mike and the machines behind the mike, let us also remember there must be a pocketbook behind the mike, and a very healthy and robust one at that.

We Americans have become so accustomed to having the good things of the earth that we accept them when they come as a matter of course. All of us turn the dials of our radio machines, and expect to get something worth listening to, without giving very much thought as to where it comes from or who is paying the bill. There are every night a certain number of what are called sponsored programs—concerts which are financed by some large business concern for publicity purposes or by some organization, because they want to get their message out over the air.

But these sponsored programs account for only a part of the broadcasting. For instance, every week there is sent out a magnificent radio tabloid production of some opera. This is called the National Grand Opera Company Hour. This costs about $3,000 a week, $156,000 a year.

This is paid for by the National Broadcasting Company. In return, it receives absolutely nothing save good will. It is a part of what is called their sustaining programs. They must keep on the air continually. They must maintain a high standard. They have assumed to perform that function for the great radio audience. It is in the nature of a trust. And they must meet it. Your great world-series games, football games, the President's addresses, great public events like the Lindbergh receptions—all these are broadcast by the National Broadcasting Company and its associated stations without any money return whatever.

Last year the National Broadcasting Company spent $6,000,000 on programs, and the stations associated with it expended an additional $2,000,000 buying time over its network. The upkeep of the two great fifty-kilowatt transmitters of WEAF and WJZ cost about $500,000 a year, and this does not include the pay roll of artists, announcers, clerks, operators, salesmen, who are required to manage and operate the stations and the business back of them. The trick of operating these great stations at a profit has not yet been worked out.

I have told of that great broadcasting program, and of the effect of the microphone upon artists, and both these subjects bring me back to Will Rogers. One of the pleasant features of being a radio announcer is the people you meet. My own five years in this new profession have brought me in touch with a long line of artists, orators, statesmen, writers, prize fighters, and celebrities of all sorts. And one of the most interesting and appealing human beings I have ever met is our old friend Will Rogers.

I had been assigned to that portion of the program which went out from his home, where he presided over the show. I was a guest at his home, and saw with delight the Will Rogers which the public does not see—the thoughtful, good-humored and proud husband and father in the midst of his fine, wholesome family life. We had a crew of men installing the necessary apparatus in Will's study. They were rushed for time, and had to eat their dinner on the fly. There are no lack of servants in the Rogers home; but Mrs. Rogers herself brought up to the study and served with her own hands the meals the men ate. That home in Beverly Hills, unlike so many of the homes in that famous moving-picture region, is very beautiful, but wholly without pretension—fine, tasteful, and costly too, but entirely unostentatious. Will said he had something he wanted to show us, as he led us out into his beautiful gardens.

"The swimming pool?" suggested someone.

"Oh no," drawled Rogers. "That's nothin' to show out this way. Everybody 'round here has a swimmin' pool. I got somethin' I like better than that."

SO HE led us to the end of the garden and through a hedge and there, spread out before us, was an enormous tanbark ring as big as Madison Square Garden. That's where Will and his kids can go out every morning with their broncos and ride around and do stunts without any danger of the youngsters getting hurt if thrown from their ponies.

However, this is not what I set out to tell. Rogers has faced millions—audiences of all sorts, on the stage, at great public functions, and on the lecture platform. But when he stood for the first time before a microphone it troubled him greatly. I had been with him in all of his broadcasting experience, and had found a way to help him, and so on the day of our great nation-wide program he was extremely nervous lest I would not show up for this performance.

Nobody is more disconcerted by the microphone than the speaker who deals in humor. A microphone is a dreadful thing to deliver a wise crack to. Rogers usually

What Changed Her?

SHE used to be so shy—never had a word to say. But now—

She talks so entertainingly, dresses stunningly and has a host of friends.

Who is she?

Just a plucky little woman who, not so very long ago, was timid, "a fraid-cat," you might say. Something changed her, and I can tell just what did. Better still, I think I'll let her tell you that herself. She writes:

"A friend of mine who had not seen me for some time said to me, 'You seem so different now. You are brighter and so much happier.'

"She was right, though I had not realized it until she spoke. And I am so very thankful. It is true: Pin Money Club work has been such good training for me and it has been such a pleasure, too. Besides adding new zest and interest to my life, the money I have earned has given me so many nice things my regular salary could not buy for me."

The Woman Who Is Always Admired—

IS THE woman who smiles. And the woman who smiles knows that deep contented feeling of security. A well-filled purse never fails to bring it, and that's why so many thousands of American Magazine readers are members of this money-making department, The Pin Money Club.

Mrs. Ora D——, a Michigan member, says:

"It is a pleasure—this Pin Money Club work of ours—and I have made good money. In just two and one half days I earned almost $30."

SOUNDS interesting, doesn't it? Surely it makes you want to know more about this Club. It will not cost you a penny to join us. Your letter will be held in strict confidence. I do hope you will write to me today!

enjoys his own jokes pretty well. He chuckles at them, and has a way of looking up quizzically to see if his audience is laughing too. If there is no audience to laugh, he is in a pretty bad state. So this night I managed to supply him with an audience. The five or six men handling the set were there, and when he was speaking I arranged them in a row the other side of the desk from Rogers.

There was a lamp on the desk, and this I tilted so that it fell upon him like the footlights. As he talked, he could see beyond it dimly the little group of men, almost like the first row of an audience. And as he got off one wise crack after another he would look up, and find them chuckling in great glee at his sallies. And that put him completely at his ease.

This was the occasion on which Rogers gave his imitation of President Coolidge for which he was so much criticized. That criticism worried Rogers very much, and he wrote to the President asking if he had been hurt by his (Rogers's) pleasantries; to which of course Mr. Coolidge replied that he had not, and had enjoyed them instead. Rogers wrote the President "that the last thing he would want to do was to wound any man's feelings." And I am sure that is true.

On that same evening he made a lot of fun of me for my description of the Pasadena Tournament of Roses, and the Stanford-Pittsburgh football game. That day, walking through his grounds with me, he said:

"Mac, do you mind if I wise-crack you a little to-night?"

I assured him I would not.

"Well," he said, "I'd like you to know what I'm goin' to say, so if you don't like it I'll change it."

"That's all right, Will," I replied.

"I know; but I want you to see it. I think I better get that paper where I got them all wrote out, and read 'em to you."

Rogers talks the way he lectures and writes.

And so he fished out a paper and read me all the things he got off about me over the radio that night. And we both had a good laugh at them.

HOWEVER, if there is one thing the broadcaster gets accustomed to, it is criticism. After every big event I am sure to get hundreds of letters raking me over the coals. If it is a fight, I will get letters telling me I should be ashamed of myself to have been so outrageously prejudiced in favor of Mr. Dempsey, and other letters telling me if I can't keep my feelings in favor of Mr. Tunney under control I ought to shut up. After the last Dempsey-Tunney fight I got no end of letters criticizing me for declaring Tunney out in that seventh round.

You will recall that in that famous round, Tunney was floored by a series of crashing left hooks and right crosses which Jack Dempsey suddenly unleashed. I began counting with the referee, telling off the count through the microphone. I was breathless with my excitement. I counted—"five—six—seven—eight—nine—and—" And this is where the argument came in. Lots of people insisted I said "—and—he's out." In several cases listeners-in shut off their loud speakers and paid their bets, and never heard the rest of the fight. Did I say

"He's out?" Well, I didn't! I said, "He's up," and I was enabled to prove that by the interposition of about as fortunate a circumstance as ever happened to me in my life. A phonograph company decided to make a phonograph record of the broadcasting of that fight. And so, in their studio, they had a loud speaker feeding into a recording instrument. When they sent me the completed record, you can bet I put it on my phonograph in a hurry and —sure enough—there was my vindication, graven in the disk, just as I had said it, and as clear as anything I ever uttered in my life. That was the second record made of my broadcasting. The first was the description of Lindbergh's arrival at New York. And I might add here that one of the greatest thrills I ever got out of radio was the first time I listened to that record, and actually heard myself broadcasting.

IT WOULD be an excellent thing for all broadcasters if they could hear themselves occasionally. Unfortunately, that is not possible. But I have a recording instrument in my home that never misses one of my own performances—and that is my wife. She sits there with pencil and paper, and when I get home she always has a collection of notes about the job. How much these have aided me it would be very difficult to exaggerate. And when I am broadcasting I always know that she is there.

But that is quite common with people who speak or sing over the radio. They know that out there "in the air" are millions of homes listening in. But their minds are invariably on that one fireside which is the most important in the world. When Gene Tunney won his last battle with Dempsey, I called him over to the "mike." He sent greetings to his friends in Greenwich, a thing for which he was much criticized. It has not occurred to a lot of the critics that Gene was not thinking so much about his swanky friends in the rich suburb where he lives, as of one little sitting-room and one loud speaker, there and someone beside it, to whom, in his hour of victory, across the air he was sending a salute.

When Jack Dempsey knocked out Sharkey, I asked him to say something through the mike. He was breathless and excited. But his first words to me were:

"Can the Coast get this, Mac?"

I told him yes, and he called out like a boy:

"Hello, Babe. I'm all right, and will come home right away."

They are all the same.

When President Coolidge delivered his last address on the night before the last national election, he concluded by saying good night to all the folks, "including my father, up on the Vermont farm listening in."

DR. HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK has written for next month a powerful article on "The Wages of Hate." Men and women, consumed by the fierce fires of hatred, have come to him for help, and he has given them the key to overcoming hatred. "To hate," he says, "is as silly as to burn down your house to get rid of a rat."

If You Want to Slow a Man Down Try Bawling Him Out

States had nothing on me at that moment.

"As I look back, I wonder if that first test of the new boy wasn't in the nature of a joker; in fact, I'm pretty sure it was. But I called the turn.

"At the end of my first week I was sent to the mail desk and made mail clerk, and when my pay envelope came at the end of the second week, I found in it a bright shiny five-dollar gold piece. I was, as you must have guessed by now, a very serious-minded and diffident lad, and I at once decided that it was a mistake. I went to Mr. Larbig, the paymaster.

"'There is some error,' I said. 'There are five dollars in my envelope.'

"'Why, what did you think you were getting?' he inquired.

"'Four dollars,' I replied.

"'Oh no, you're not,' he assured me. 'You go and see Mr. Welles.' I went. He said that the five dollars were all mine, and added kindly:

"'Albert, you are the best office boy we ever had.'

"Now, if anything in the world could have been counted upon to start a serious-minded boy such as I upon the right path, that five dollars and the praise was it. From that day I put a fervor into my work that was devout."

LONG before the school vacation had ended, Albert Salt knew that he did not want to be a minister or to go to school again; he wanted nothing but to be permitted to go on in the wonderful work of which he was now a part. He had hard work convincing his parents and his grandparents that he should stop school. But he finally sold them the idea, after he had promised that he would study every night with his grandfather. He kept his word.

"It wasn't easy," he admitted, "for many a night I had to work overtime and would come home dead-tired at ten P. M. But my grandfather and I kept at it year after year, and in the end I had a pretty liberal education.

"The office was a liberal education too. Think for a moment of the kind of men I had about me: There was Professor Elisha Gray, the 'Gray' in Graybar, who was a great inventor, responsible for many inventions in electrical mechanism; Enos M. Barton, the 'Bar' in Graybar, who was our executive head and a man of great ability and foresight; Mr. Welles went abroad, but we had left Charles H. Brown, now a patent lawyer in Chicago; General Anson Stager, David Brooks, who was also an inventor, all talented and able men whose names are now known to everyone in this industry, men who might serve as a powerful stimulus to any boy.

"Barton was a wonderful letter writer. He had a great command of English and his letters were my envy and my guide. All of the men were good to me. I was the youngest of the clerks, the others were eight or ten years my senior. And these men all took time to talk with me and to help me, and I often walked part of the way home with one of them. The second year I was there, Mr. H. B. Thayer, now chairman of the Board of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, came to take charge of the office. In a very short time we became friends and we are intimate friends to this day.

"Of course, I had my ups and downs. When I was bill clerk, I was fired. We had a new report sent us to be filled in. I remember it well, Form 242 of the American Bell Telephone Company. There were columns defining the different types of magneto bells manufactured by the Western Electric Company. There was no key to help me make out the report, so I filled it in as I thought it should be done, and the first week it was O. K. The report for the next week came along and it carried no balances forward. Lacking instructions, I repeated the balances in the body of the report. Mr. Barton, our general manager, was at the main office in Chicago. The reports coming to him had been full of errors, and he said:

"'If that New York report comes in wrong, I'll fire the man who wrote it.' That was my report. It came and it was wrong, and Barton wrote to Mr. Brown at the New York office;

"'When I come back, I don't want to find that man Salt around.'

"Brown told me. 'All right,' I said, 'I'll get out. I don't seem to be making much progress here, anyway.'

"'Huh,' he returned, 'you get back on the job and pay no attention to this.' I went back to my desk, red and discomfited.

"I waited in fear and dread for Barton's return. When he came to my high desk, where I sat enclosed within an iron grating, my heart was pounding. But his face was wreathed in smiles.

"'How are you, Albert?' he said, 'I'm glad to see you.'

"'I—I'm pretty well,' I managed to stammer. 'I—I guess I'm learning a little something.'

"'Good,' he said warmly, and went on.

"I could hardly believe that the dread moment had passed. Nor had it. Before long Mr. Thayer came down-stairs, peeped into my cage and said:

"'Albert, Mr. Barton wants to see you.' I got up the stairs somehow, and there sat Mr. Barton, grinning.

"'Albert,' he said, 'I'd clean forgotten your name was Salt!' I took a deep breath.

"'Mr. Barton,' I began, 'I'm sorry about the mistake. I realize it was inexcusable, but I think we all make mistakes, and'—I was floundering wildly now—'I think sometimes we benefit by our mistakes, when we make mistakes—'

"He was laughing aloud by that time.

"'You do!' he said. 'Good! Now get back to work!' I got.

"THAT incident taught me a valuable lesson. I had been scared for days about my interview with Mr. Barton, and for nothing. I determined to stop being scared. And if there is one thing I want to do as an executive, it is to train my force to stop being scared. Fear prevents a man from giving the whole of himself to his work. It prevents him from developing ideas; or, if he develops ideas he feels that they may not be vital to his organization, and discounts them.

"When I made the mistake in my report I wanted to leave before Barton returned. I was afraid to face him. Brown, the good friend who kept me there, saved me from making a fool of myself. I did know enough to confess with entire frankness and to state that I was sorry. I floundered about pretty badly but it was evident that I was sincere. Frankly to confess and say you are sorry clarifies almost any situation.

"Just once in those early days, and the only time in my whole life, I asked for what I thought was a promotion. The job I was holding was that of bill clerk, and it didn't pay much, although I was a kind of assistant to Mr. Thayer. The shipping clerk was leaving. He was paid three dollars a week more than I, and I wanted those three dollars. I wanted them so hard that I could see nothing else. I asked Mr. Thayer to give me the job. He said I couldn't have it. I was mad clear through, and demanded the reason. He said:

"'Albert, I don't have to give you a reason. You can't have the job; you are going to stay and assist me.'

"Some saving grace stayed my tongue. Maybe deep within me I had a sneaking suspicion that I wasn't sizing the thing up right. What I did not see was that by becoming a shipping clerk in that organization I would be sidetracked from further promotion. My vision was completely obscured by the three dollars a week. And a few dollars a week extra blurs the vision of a good many young people."

FOR three years Salt listened to words of wisdom from his associates and did as he was told.

"They called me 'Little Willie,'" he said, laughing, "and some of them call me that until this day. 'Let Little Willie do it' was a popular saying in our office. I had a thorough training, but it was a kindly one, and many a day I was guided over a mistake by an earnest friend who put an arm over my shoulder as he talked. And that took a good deal of the sting of it away. I use the same method with the boys under me. If an employee has to be corrected, it is senseless to bawl him out. In all probability, the only result of a bawling out will be to get him in a state of mind in which he will go over and over the reprimand for the next three weeks, and all that time his work will be below his standard. We learn through making mistakes, and the only reason for showing up mistakes is to help a man to learn faster."

At the end of three years, the Western Electric Company decided to send a salesman out on the road, and Salt was selected for the experiment. The company had never had a salesman; it was pioneer work.

"I had an equipment that would bring a smile to the face of any modern salesman," he said. "Catalogues were useless, people wanted to see the apparatus. So I traveled with a big trunk in which were samples of fire alarms, vibrating bells, annunciators, wire, push buttons, batteries, and all the electrical chicken feed of that year. I was to see two classes of customers: the telephone companies and the electricians. In those days, an electrician was anybody who could connect an electric battery with a push button. Much of this stuff was new and it had to be explained in detail, set up and demonstrated."

"Salt was a first-class salesman," said

Thayer, "because he made friends everywhere, and because he never knew when he was beaten. If a man told him he had just ordered a bill of supplies, Salt continued to call on him and talk with him, even after the order had come in. And he kept on calling and talking, and finally he got an order for himself."

When Salt became a salesman he was not quite twenty years old. But he had grown up. He was building intelligently for the future. And, like many of the men who have helped to make telephone history, he was profoundly aware that he was a part of a great movement.

But there were disgruntled customers, too, and Salt had to deal with these.

"Gradually it got to be a saying in the company that I liked a disagreeable job," he said. "They never made a greater mistake, but I didn't let them find it out.

"More than once I've heard an officer say:

"'Let Salt tackle that; he likes that kind of thing,' and I have uttered deep groans within myself, and have gone out and tackled the blamed job. To this day, a lot of people about here think I delight in wrestling with the toughest proposition there is. I don't; I just do it. But I'm bound to say it often isn't as bad as it is painted."

During his twenty years on the road Salt developed a creed of salesmanship, a simple, homely creed that is replete with wisdom.

"I was helped," he said, "by the fact that I love to trade. I know nothing that gives me more exhilaration than being mixed up in a deal. Any man is fortunate who approaches selling in that way.

"NOW, I know just two ways to make people think of you as a good fellow. The first is to take your loss with a smile. If you don't get an order, smile about it, even if it does stretch your face. For the man who did not give you the order will remember you as a good sport. Nobody can get all the business in the world. I've heard all the things any salesman hears: that my price was too high and my terms unsatisfactory, but I kept at it just the same.

"I was convinced that my price was right and my terms what they should be, so I persisted in trying to convince the other fellow. If he was unusually difficult, I always tried to delay the order a day or so. It is wonderful what reflection will do. A man gets started on an argument and he won't back down in the heat of the fray. But give in for the time being, and retire, with the understanding that the order will not be given to someone else before you return. Then come back and forget the argument, and begin all over with the goods and the price and terms, and often the war is over and you've won.

"A salesman must know his goods, and also his markets, thoroughly. He should wear good enough clothing so that he can forget his clothes. Under no circumstances should he smoke when he is coming into an office. I want to make this emphatic. There are many men who do not like smoke, and others who may happen to abominate your particular brand. Smoke if you are asked, and smoke only what you are sure the other man likes.

"Never knock the other fellow who sells a similar line.

Stop Crooked Heels

Keep your shoes smart

IT is the way you walk that makes your heels wear crooked, or shoes "run-over"—not the fault of the shoes. It mars your grace and spoils the otherwise good impression your appearance makes. It also causes your ankles to wobble, weaken and thicken.

Correct this fault by wearing Dr. Scholl's Walk-Strate Heel Pads. They equalize the body's weight, remove all strain and make walking a pleasure. You save more than their cost in heel repairs alone, and preserve the shape of your shoes. Quickly attached inside any shoe. Sizes for men and women. "There's the new Ned Tyson"

He's making $6500 a year now

"I USED to know him when I was a kid—we went to grammar school together.

"Then his father died and he had to go to work. Got a job with Brooks & Watson as a clerk, but couldn't seem to get ahead.

"Then overnight something seemed to wake him up. He began making suggestions to the firm—helped them to save a great deal of money.

"Then Old Man Brooks became interested—wanted to know how Ned happened to know so much about the business. Ned told him he'd been studying at home at nights through the International Correspondence Schools. 'H'm,' said Mr. Brooks, 'I'll remember that.'

"He did too. Put Ned out on the road as a salesman for a year or so and then brought him into the main office as sales manager.

"He's getting $6500 a year now and everybody calls him 'the new Ned Tyson.' I've never seen such a change in a man in my life. The I. C. S. deserves a lot of credit."

An International Correspondence Schools course will help you just as it helped Ned Tyson. It will help you to have the happy home—the bigger salary—the comforts you'd like to have. Start today to make good. At least find out what this great school can do for you.

"Five salesmen were trying to sell tractors to a Farmers' Coöperative. Each one was allowed to speak ten minutes, and all five spent the time in knocking the machines of the other four. At the end of the speeches, one old farmer rose.

"'If them machines,' he said, 'are anyways near as bad as these fellows make out, we're better off without any of them. I move we don't buy.'

"And they didn't. Knockers reduce the prospective buyer to a state of fuddlement in which he doesn't know what to believe, and he ends by not believing anybody.

"All this is subordinate to the two main points: Keep your smile and your optimism, and, in the second place, cultivate friends. But don't make the mistake of being too good a mixer. You need your energies for selling, not carousing, and you've got to be independent and able to look any man in the eye and tell him to go to a warmer place if you feel like it. The easiest way to make friends is to go out of your way to do someone a favor."

"But," I objected, "the time and energy. How about the cost of these favors?"

Albert Lincoln Salt leaned over his desk and pounded it gently with his fist.

"You never count the cost," he said. "That is the thing you never think of. What you want is friendship. Get that in your mind and you won't know there is a cost. Doing things for people is part of the day's work, and a very pleasant part at that. Many a man to whom I sold electrical goods asked me to buy him something in New York. I always did. I also looked up markets for him, and did anything in my power that he asked. And I did it at once, the minute I returned. If you are going to be a good salesman there is no limiting your service to the thing in hand.

"If you have that thing they call personal magnetism you are in luck; but you can cultivate something a bit better. Keep believing everything is coming out for the best, wear your smile, avoid gossip, and do everything you can for everybody you can, and the hardest-boiled buyer will soften in time if you keep at it. I tell you it works, for I have seen it from both sides. I've been both salesman and buyer for the past forty years—twenty of each."

IT WAS about 1904 that the selling of supplies to the telephone companies arrived at a point where it was possible to eliminate competition. By that time, the Western Electric Company had grown so that it manufactured all but a small part of the telephone equipment, and it proposed to the various telephone companies that they contract with it to act as sole supply for all their needs. If the Western Electric Company did not manufacture goods needed, it would act as purchasing agent for them. Thayer and Salt put this gigantic deal across. It meant visiting every licensee of the Bell Telephone Company and explaining the plan. When the contracts were all signed, Salt's job as salesman ended. He was now promoted to be purchasing agent, responsible for the purchasing of all the materials used by the telephone companies. In the twenty years that he has developed this job he has become the biggest single purchasing power in the country. Buying for the telephone companies meant an acquaintance with every single item used by them. Not only did Salt buy raw materials used in the manufacture of parts, wires, conduits, poles and instruments, but he also purchased bread and butter and all kinds of food for the company restaurants, drugs for the medical departments, thousands of yards of woolen cloth to be made into uniforms for messenger boys and elevator runners and booth attendants; brick, mortar, stone, and heating plants for buildings; silverware and table supplies, uniforms for nurses, curtains, phonographs, rugs and pianos for rest-rooms.

This huge purchasing power mounted until it reached a total of two hundred and fifty millions a year. Salt had over a hundred assistants, many of them men whose work lay in special fields. To their surprise, their boss seemed to have a knowledge of goods that was almost universal.

"ONE of his big purchases was diamonds," said a man who has worked under him for years. "Diamonds are used for what is known as 'drawing the wires.' That means that in making wire finer the sides are cut off by passing the wires along the sharp edges of diamonds. Salt knew little of the value of diamonds but he became an expert. And, like the good fellow he is, he soon shared that knowledge. I'd just like to know how many engagement rings Salt has helped to buy. When a young fellow working for the company got engaged, naturally, he wanted the best stone he could get, and he would ask Salt's advice. Salt would send out for a selection of stones, and if he had been buying for his own wife he couldn't have exercised more care than he did in helping that boy select the very best one for the money he had to spend.

Salt has always been happy in his home life. He loved his father and mother devotedly. When he married, just after he became a salesman, he gave his wife the same kind of affection. When his son was born his domestic happiness was complete. His son is now a successful engineer and the family life runs placidly on. To his work, Salt gave much the same quality of devotion. He regards the development of the telephone as epoch making. He is prouder of his part in that development than of his title as president. A man who is thoroughly and wholesomely happy, and who is giving himself to interests for which he has real feeling is giving much to life and getting much from life.

IF YOU want to know what men think about women and what women think about men do not fail to get next month's "The American Magazine." In two companion articles, written anonymously so that they could be written very outspokenly, the truth crackles and sparkles. You will be tickled or chagrined, according to your sex and the indictment made against it, as various masculine and feminine foibles and habits are laid bare. Paradoxically speaking, these articles are intended to create a better understanding of the misunderstanding that exists between men and women. And they certainly succeed in their mission.

My Ship Must Have Got Sunk

sacrilegious, but the reason we would like to see Christmas only every four years is very apparent: The day has become a day of gift-giving, a day when the pockets of Santa Claus are turned inside out to make certain that a dime has not lodged in the pucker where Mrs. Santa Claus sewed up the hole in the pocket. The merchants play up Santa Claus, the day schools and the Sunday-schools play him up, and we fathers and mothers play him up.

Both Edyrl and Lyril firmly believed in him for many years and we would not have them disbelieve, though their absolute faith in that gentleman's generosity put a sharp kink in our finances. In fact, Lyril's appetite for expensive gifts so increased with her age that we simply had to make it plain to her that Santa had demised so far as she was concerned. Well, that did not ease us up much, for we had to tell her in such a way that she would not lose faith in our own veracity. So we explained that we were all Santa Clauses, all gift-givers, and, therefore, she also was a Santa Claus. And that started the little thing giving gifts to us and to her playmates—and we foot the bills.

All of which helps the gift merchant. We, poor people, have no credit rating established with him. We pay him cash and hold up the groceryman, and the coal man, and the doctor. Those are the patient boys.

IONE and I made a list of our mutual relations to whom we wanted to give presents the first Christmas after we married, and found it totaled to nineteen persons. We were married in the springtime, so at this joyful period we still owed for our furniture, were back in the rent, and had with us the ever-present grocery bill and coal bill. It looked like a fat chance we had of giving gifts, on the twelve dollars a week I drew. We did the only thing we could do: We slashed every soul from our list except Ione's parents and my mother. That sounds simple, but it was not done without heartaches.

We could only sit tight and hate ourselves. After Christmas, when we had received our gifts we wrote them, and explained that our bank had met with disaster upon our wedding day. We felt like a couple of relationcides when we mailed those letters; but the next Christmas we felt much better when those to whom giving had also become a burden merely sent us greeting cards.

Easter is not so bad. We get each of the girls a new outfit—hat, dress, and shoes; but they would have to have them anyway, and we never would be abler to afford them at any subsequent time than at Easter. Ione dyes her old hat and makes an old dress over, and I give an extra shine to my shoes, omit my hat and hope folks will take me for a college lad.

Then the glorious Fourth of July comes along with a bang that blows the bottom clear out of the pocketbook before it has fully recovered from the orgies of Christmas and Easter, and we get less for our Headache! Constipation! Bad Breath!

Don't neglect these important indications . . . . "Intestinal toxicity" should be recognized and checked . . . .

WE ALL eat too much food . . . too much rich food . . . and take too little exercise. We don't eliminate our waste material as completely and regularly as we should and it becomes poisonous . . . toxic.

So, with our eliminative facilities clogged with these poisons, we develop what doctors call "intestinal toxicity." Then we deaden our headaches temporarily with drugs . . . and perfume our bad breath to prevent social embarrassment!

In the tropics . . . India, Africa, the Canal Zone, wherever intestinal disorders are a supreme menace to existence . . . they have learned to combat constipation with ENO's Effervescent Saline Laxative.

For 60 years this sparkling laxative has been used the world over—the accepted standard everywhere. Perhaps you have already found ENO on trains and boats in some far corner of the world and already appreciate its delightful sparkle, its pleasant taste and its gentle yet thorough action.

ENO never leaves you "all dragged out." . . . It will not gripe you nor disturb the day's routine . . . for it simply flushes and effectively cleanses the whole intestinal tract and gently speeds up normal action.

Try ENO for a week—every morning or evening. You'll give it a regular place on your bathroom shelf when you have once experienced the keen, clear-eyed health that is possible for those free from the absorption of intestinal toxins . . . poisons carried by the blood stream to all parts of the body.

This famous effervescent saline is available at all druggists at 75c and $1.25 a bottle. Prepared only by J. C. Eno, Ltd., London, England. Sales Agents: Harold F. Ritchie & Co., Inc., Belmont Building, Madison Ave. at 34th St., New York.

ENO — health precaution — will cost you less than 3c a day.

When you get up, simply take a glass of water and add a generous teaspoonful of ENO. A regular dash of this sparkling, delightful saline will help to keep you fit and eager through the hardest day.

For a business headache, nothing is better than a glass of ENO. You can get it at the better soda fountains everywhere.

money on the Fourth than at any other time. It usually costs us between four and five dollars, and all we have to show for it the morning after is a mess to sweep off the sidewalk and lawn and a few fingers with rags wrapped around them. Believe me, money goes up in powder faster than it does in a burning oil well.

MAYBE all this sounds like a long moan from a very poor man. It is more than that: it is a long wail right from the very heart of a poor man's purse. Raising a family on twenty-five a week, and finding so many things coming along which are not listed in the budget will make any man squeeze the dollar till the eagle screams.

There are other holidays and they all cost extra. If there is nothing else we can do to spend the money we haven't got, we take in an extra show, for the holiday must be a day marked by a white stone. There's the picnic on Labor Day. Picnic lunches cost more than eating at home, and there is nothing left for the inevitable hash, as after Thanksgiving. There is the merry-go-round, which costs twice as much to ride as when we were young, and those new thrill rides, which cost even more, and the numerous freak shows, museums, and cane racks. Ione and I have had our day. We can amuse ourselves milling around with the crowds; but we do not expect Edyrl and Lyril to enjoy themselves that way. It is part of their education, their birthright, to see everything while they are young enough to enjoy the glamour and romance, without seeing the squalor behind the tawdry gold and paint.

We early hit upon a plan to see the circus. When Edyrl and Lyril got large enough so we had to pay full price for them—notice I said "large enough" and not "old enough"—we made the proposition that the first year we would go out to the grounds and rubber-neck the show from the outside—just watch the show folks eat, see the horses, and whatever animals were getting fresh air, and all the free attractions as they were exhibited on the platforms before the side-show tents. We listened to the spielers, and when it was all over we watched the tents come down, and went to the railroad yards and saw them load up.

The following year we took in the side shows and Lyril bought a picture of the troupe of midgets, and we milled around viewing the freaks and entertainers until they put us out. The next year was to be the real circus, the big top. All of us watched the billboards, hoping that this circus would be the biggest show on earth. It was. The big red letters said so. We got in early and saw the menagerie, and got reserved seats and bought cracker-jack and pink lemonade, and completely demolished the bank roll again. Now the girls want to get me up at three A. M. to see the next circus unload, but I am afraid they will never succeed. I have not been up that early since the year of Halley's comet.

No wonder we poor folks are poor. We come as near doing what better paid folks do as we can on our limited capital and credit. I am not arguing the question at all. I am merely telling you what we do and how we do it.

Birthdays cost a lot too, but we contrive to get useful gifts. We even bought dining-room chairs, one at a time, and though each of us knew what we were to get, we were expected to enter the dining-room and be surprised and admire the gift. Last year we bought each of the girls a writing desk, so that they would have a place of their very own for their school things. And we always buy a quart of ice cream, and whoever has the birthday names the flavor, and Ione bakes a wonderful cake, and there are candles. I believe that all these little needless expenditures will come nearer keeping the family together as they grow older than if we saved our money and had a grand blow-out, say, once a year. Anyhow, children seem to like quantity rather than quality in their entertainment.

Lest any young couple should read this article of expenses and be deterred from the responsibilities of raising a family, let me tell you what Ione said the other day when I asked her seriously if she would want to raise a family, supposing we were starting all over again. She said, "Why, what would we have to live for if we did not have our girls?" Most poor people get much of their pleasure from their family. Ione ought to know. It has been harder for her than for me. She has not had a vacation since Edyrl was a baby. That year she went home for a visit. Since then she has been on the job day and night taking care of us three children. I am including myself, for I cannot imagine myself being able to get along without her. I do not know how a bachelor gets along without a little nursing now and then. Why, the day she left for home, I piled the furniture into the front room and covered it over with a sheet to keep the dust off, and I got the kitchen utensils out as I needed them and left them out where they would be handy. The landlord came along and thought we had deserted the house, and inquired at the store if anyone knew what had become of us. But Ione is not constructed that way. She must have everything spick and span, even though it takes a lot of work and she looks pretty ragged and worn.

Of course I get a vacation once a year—a week on pay. I have had it at all seasons. I took it when the babies were born, so I could be at home and help with the work, and hold the yelling dervishes and potter around the garden. A vacation was valuable to me those days. But since then we have always been striving to do something out of the ordinary, so "Father will have a good time." Isn't that nice?

NEXT year, we want to become tumbleweed tourists. You know a tumbleweed is a plant which grows in the plains country and curls up in the fall into a round ball, sometimes as large as an ash pit. The winds blow it loose from the ground, and continues to blow it this way and that unless it lines up in some fence corner and clings. Well, tumbleweed tourists are like that. They are poor folks who take a vacation on the week's salary they draw in advance, in a broken-down car which they optimistically hope will hang together until they return.

I have seen a lot of these tumbleweeds. I know them well. They are mostly honest people. Their only crime is that they are poor, and if they have a round of hard luck, as they often do, they must ask aid. Though I am not smart enough to tell how they can be gotten rid of, yet I am smart enough to tell how they cannot be gotten rid of. It cannot be done by edict. There is always someone who will help them out.

I realize that many touring families apply for aid who are unworthy. The real tumbleweed would be all right if something unforeseen did not occur, but he does not foresee very far—no poor man does. If his car breaks down, or his children become ill, he has to ask aid. He says, and believes, that he will pay the money back; but he probably never will have it to spare.

Another vacation we have planned for some time is to rent a cabin somewhere up in the mountains for a couple of weeks. Just go up there and climb about in the wild parks where there are no "Keep off the Grass" signs, and drink from the cool springs, and in the twilight lie down to rest, and gaze up through the telescoping hills to the starry heavens, unhindered by the glare of city lights, to be awakened in the morning by the wild birds singing. Sure, we know that takes money; but perhaps some day our ship will come in, and then—

But the poor man's ship never makes port. It is one of those ships that pass in the night. Once in a while he can hear the purr of its motors if he listens closely, and sometimes he catches the gleam of its lights far across the harbor's mouth. Some one of us, more daring than the others, may take a small boat and row out into the path of the vessel. We hear him hail from his frail craft, "Ship, ahoy!" And we hear him no more among us.

"Boys will be boys. I reckon you didn't know your mind any better'n Amy knew hers. She broke the hearts of all the cowboys on the range—an' then up an' married John Dabb. He was a widower with a daughter 'most as old as Amy. They were married a year or so ago. It was a poor match, they say. Amy is not happy, an' she flirts as much as ever."

Trueman Rock dropped his head.

"Son, it's the way of life," went on Winter. "You've been gone a long time. An' things happen to people, most of it sad, I'm sorry to say."

"Sol, will you keep my money till I come askin' for it?"

"Now, True, what're you up to?"

"I'm goin' out and get awful, terrible drunk," declared Rock tragically.

Winter laughed, though he looked serious enough.

"Don't do it, True."

"I am, by gosh!"

"Please don't, son. It'll only fetch back the old bad habit. You look so fine now, I'd hate to see you do it."

"I'm goin' to drown my grief, Sol," declared Rock solemnly.

"Well, wait till I come back," returned Winter. "I've got to go to the station. My clerk is off to-day. Keep store for me. There's not much chance of any customer comin' in at this noon hour. But if one does come, you wait on him—like you used to."

"All right. I'll keep store. But you rustle back here pronto!"

Youth is the Mode!

You are only as old as your feet

TO look and act young, you must have the spirit of youth—you must feel young. There is no substitute for a body that has freshness and vivacity, buoyancy and vitality.

Tired, worn nerves make tired, worn men and women. One of the two principal causes of nerve exhaustion, doctors say, are the feet. Aching feet dissipate vitality, make you half sick most of the time, and much older-looking than you are.

You can stop this constant drain of nervous energy. It is very simple, easy and sure. And it will lift years from your face and your walk—truly make you young again.

For real foot health, massage your feet with Dr. Scholl's Foot Balm. It puts new life, strength and endurance in them. Gives you complete comfort from the moment you start using it.

It insures a day of perfect comfort on your feet. You can stand, walk or work for hours—go through your daily tasks without a murmur from your feet. You will be able to enjoy long walks, hikes, golf, play tennis or dance to your heart's content.

Even after a hard day or evening on your feet, when they ache or pain unbearably, you get quick, grateful relief, enabling you to resume active use of your feet hours longer without protest from them... Dr. Scholl's Foot Balm is a cooling, soothing emollient of remarkable curative, revitalizing and pain-allaying properties. It stimulates the skin...opens the pores...removes impurities...tones up the muscles and tissues.

Instantly stops burning sensations, aches and pain, soreness and tenderness. Quiets corns, callouses and bunions. Dispels foot odors.

Winter hurried out, leaving Rock sitting on the counter, a prey to symptoms he well knew. . . . If Sol did not hurry back—

A light, quick step arrested the current of Trueman's thoughts. He looked up. A girl had entered the store. His first swift sight of her caused him to slip off the counter. She looked around expectantly, and, seeing Rock, she hesitated, then came forward. Rock suddenly realized that to get terribly drunk was the very remotest thing that he wanted or intended to do.

"Is Mr. Winter in?" asked the girl, pausing before the counter.

"No. He had to go to the station. Reckon he'll be there for quite some time."

"Oh—I'm sorry. I—I can't wait. And I wanted him particularly."

"Can I do anythin' for you?" inquired Rock. He was cool, easy, respectful.

"Are you the new clerk Mr. Winter was expecting?"

"Yes, miss, at your service."

"I've quite a list of things to get," she said, opening a hand bag.

"I'll do my best, miss. But I'm a little new to the business."

"That's all right. I'll help you," she returned graciously. "Now, where is that paper?"

The delay gave Trueman opportunity to look at her covertly. She was thoroughbred Western, twenty-one or -two, blond, with fair hair more silver than gold. She was not robust of build, yet scarcely slender. She wore a faded little blue bonnet not of the latest style, and her plain white dress, though clean and neat, had seen long service.

"Here it is," she said, producing a slip of paper and looking up, somewhat flushed. Her eyes were large, wide apart, gray in color. Rock looked into them. Something happened to him then that had never happened before, and which could never happen again. "Now, shall I read the list off one at a time or all together?"

"Well, miss, it really doesn't—make any difference," replied Trueman, vaguely, gazing at her lips. They were sweet and full and red, and just now curved into a little questioning smile. But, as he watched, it fled, and then they seemed sad. Indeed, her whole face seemed sad, particularly the deep gray eyes, that had begun to regard him somewhat doubtfully.

"Very well. The groceries first," she said, consulting her list. "Five of sugar, five of rice, five—"

"FIVE what?" interrupted Trueman, with alacrity, moving toward the grocery department. Everything was in plain sight. It ought to be easy, if he could keep his eyes off her.

"Five what!" she echoed, in surprise, raising her head. "Did you think I meant barrels? Five pounds."

"Sure. That's what I thought," replied Trueman hastily. "But some people buy this stuff in bulk. I used to."

"Oh. You were not always a clerk then?" she inquired, following him.

"Oh—no. I've been a—a lot of things."

She looked as if she believed him. Rock began to grasp that he was bungling the greatest opportunity of his life. He found the sugar, and had almost filled a large sack when she checked him: "Not brown sugar; white, please."

There was something in her tone that made Rock wonder if she were laughing at him. It stirred him to dexterity rather than clumsiness. He filled a large paper bag with white sugar.

"But you didn't weigh it," she said.

"I never weigh out small amounts," he returned blandly. "I can guess very accurately."

"There's more than five pounds of sugar in that bag," she protested.

"Probably, a little. Sure, I never guess under weight." He laid the bag on the counter. "What next? Oh, the rice."

"Can you guess the weight of rice too?"

"Sure can. Even better. It's not near so heavy as sugar." And he filled a larger bag. In attempting to pass this to her, he accidentally touched her bare hand with his. The soft contact shot a thrilling current through him. He dropped the bag. It burst, and the rice poured all over her, and, like a white stream, to the floor.

"There—you've done it!" she said, aghast.

"Excuse me, miss. I'm sure awkward this day. But rice is lucky. That might be a good omen. I'm superstitious. Spillin' rice might mean a weddin'?"

She blushed, but spoke up with spirit. "It couldn't so far as I'm concerned," she said. "Of course I don't know your affairs. But you are wasting my time. I must hurry. They'll be waiting."

Rock humbly apologized and proceeded to fill another bag with rice. Then he went on with the order and for several moments, in which he kept his eyes averted, he performed very well as a clerk. He certainly prayed that Sol Winter would not come back soon.

WHO was she? He had never in his life met such a girl. She could not be married. Too young and—he did not know what! He stole a glance at her left hand. Ringless! What a strong, shapely hand, neither too large nor too small, nor red and rough, like that of most ranchers' daughters. It was, however, a hand that had seen work.

Naturally, Rock wondered if she rode a horse. The goddess of every cowboy's dreams was a horsewoman. Did he dare to ask her if she loved a horse? Rock divined that his usual audacity and adroitness with the feminine sex were wanting here.

"That's all the groceries," she said. "Now I want buttons, thread, calico, dress goods, linen, and—"

At the dry-goods counter Rock was in a quandary. He could not find anything. The young lady calmly walked behind the counter.

"Can't you read?" she inquired, pointing at some boxes.

"Read!" exclaimed Trueman, in an injured tone. "Sure I can read. I went to school for eight years. That's about four more than any cowpuncher I ever met."

"Indeed. No one would suspect it," she returned demurely. "If you're a cowboy—what're you doing in here?"

"I just lately went to clerking," he hastened to reply.

"Show me the buttons. There, in the white boxes. . . . Thank you."

While she bent over them, looking and assorting, Trueman regained something near composure, and he feasted his eyes on the little stray locks of fair hair that peeped from under her bonnet, on the small well-shaped ear, on the nape of her neck, beautiful and white, and upon the contour of cheek.

"It isn't pearl?" she inquired, holding a button in her palm.

"Sure is," he replied dreamily, meaning her cheek, suddenly, terribly aware of its nearness and sweetness.

"That pearl!" she exclaimed in amaze looking up. "Don't you know bone when you see it?"

"Oh—the button. I wasn't lookin' at it. . . . Sure, that's bone. If you want pearl buttons maybe I can help." And he bent over the box. It was not necessary to bend with his head so close to hers, but he did so, until he felt one of those stray silky locks of hair brush his cheek. She felt it too, for there seemed to come a sudden still check to everything in connection with the business at hand. Then she drew away.

"Thank you. I can help myself. You find the thread."

It turned out that she had to find the thread too, and then asked to see a certain kind of dress goods, utterly foreign to him, and which she had to locate herself.

"How much of this?" asked Rock, stripping off yards of the soft material.

"Five. And I want it cut on the bias."

"On the bias," he echoed. "Oh, sure.' And he went at the task desperately, realizing full well that he could not stand this deception much longer. But he had not progressed very far when she interrupted: "Stop! You'll ruin it. That's not the way I want it cut." She brushed him aside, and, taking up the shears, began carefully to cut the material.

"I'm sorry," spoke up Rock, contritely. "I'm not usually so dumb. But, you see, I never before waited on such a . . . a girl as you."

She shot him a gray glance, not wholly doubtful or unforgiving. And meeting his eyes caused her to look down again, with a tinge of color staining her cheeks.

"I'm not a clerk. Good heavens! If the gangs I've ridden with would drop in here to see me—doin' this. Whew! . . . My name is Trueman Rock. I'm an old friend of Sol Winter."

"Trueman Rock?" she repeated, almost with a start, as she swiftly lifted big, questioning, surprised eyes. That name was not unfamiliar to her; but Rock could not tell whether she attached good or bad to it.

"YES. I used to ride this range years ago. I've been gone six years—five of which I've spent in Texas, workin' hard and—well, I'd like you to know, because maybe you've heard talk here. Workin' hard and goin' straight. I sold out. Somethin' drew me back to Wagontongue. Got here to-day, and when I ran in to see Sol he left me here in charge of the store. Said no one would come in, but if someone did to wait on him . . . Well, as you see someone did come in. I'm sorry I've annoyed you, kept you waitin'. But it was Sol's fault. Only, I should have told you first off."

"You needn't apologize, Mr. Rock," she replied shyly. "There's no harm done, except to the rice."

"Come on with us— it will do you good"

HER husband and her sister are going to the country club dance. She would like to go . . . but hasn't the energy. She is "too tired" . . . as usual.

And, when they were first married, she was always the one who thought of interesting things to do. Now, so much of the time, she is listless, unhappy, bored.

The change came about gradually. But now, without understanding why, they both know that the joy and zest have gone out of their marriage.

These pathetic, "quiet tragedies" are very common, and so often they are unnecessary. They are caused, so often, because the wife is negligent about the delicate matter of personal hygiene—or perhaps because she does not understand the facts about it.

BEING UNSELFISH

IN time of sorrow the unselfish way is to be grateful for having shared such a life as that just closed, and to make sure we fulfill every obligation to that cherished memory.

Our greatest obligation is to provide the most absolute and positive protection for the precious remains.

It will be a constant comfort through all of the trying hours to come, to know that we did not slight this obligation, that we provided the Clark Grave Vault.

Designed according to an immutable law of Nature, this vault never has failed to protect during all of the quarter of a century it has been in use. This positive, permanent protection is due to its construction of Armco Ingot Iron, or Keystone copper steel, 12 gauge thickness and of special quality, with a plating of pure cadmium on the higher priced vaults (applied by the Udylite process, exclusive on this vault). Being made of metal it is not porous.

Science knows no greater protection than is found in the Clark Grave Vault.

Leading funeral directors recommend this vault and give a 50-year guaranty with each one.

Less than Clark complete protection is no protection at all!

CLARK

GRAVE VAULT

This trade-mark is on every genuine Clark Grave Vault. It is a means of identifying the vault instantly. Unless you see this mark, the vault is not a Clark.

"I'm not so sure of that," he returned coolly. Now that the deception was past he had begun to feel more like himself.

"Please wrap these for me," she said, pushing the cut goods along the counter, but she did not look up.

Elaborately Trueman wrapped those parcels.

"Charge to Thiry Preston," she said.

He found a pencil near at hand and, bending over a piece of wrapping paper, very businesslike, he inquired:

"Miss Thiry Preston?"

"Yes, Miss," she replied.

"What place?" he went on. "Where do you live?"

"Sunset Pass."

"WAY out there?" He glanced up in surprise. "Sixty miles I know that country—every waterhole, stone, bunch of cactus, and jackrabbit."

She smiled fully for the first time, and that smile further fascinated Rock

"You were well acquainted, weren't you?"

"I expect to renew old acquaintances out there. And I may be lucky enough to make new ones."

Miss Preston did not meet his glance, and there was other evidence of discouragement.

"What instructions about these parcels?"

"None. I'll carry them."

"Carry them! All this heavy load? Thirty pounds or more."

"Surely. I m quite strong. I've carried far more."

"Where to?"

"Out to the corral. Our buckboard is there. They'll be waiting, and I'm late. I must hurry."

In rather nervous haste she took up the several light packages and moved toward the other counter. Rock got there first and intercepted her.

"But you shouldn't leave the store," she protested.

Fortunately, at this juncture Sol Winter hurriedly entered.

"Well, now, what's this?" he queried, with a broad smile. "Thiry, to think you'd happen in just the wrong minute!"

"Oh, Mr. Winter, I didn't miss you at all," returned Thiry gayly. "Your new clerk was most obliging and—and capable—after I found the things I needed."

"Haw! Haw! He's shore a fine clerk. . . . Thiry, meet True Rock, old rider an' pard of mine."

"Ah—I remember now!" she flashed. "Is Mr. Rock the rider who once saved your son Nick?"

"Yes, Thiry," he replied, and turning to Rock he added, "Son, this lass is Miss Thiry Preston, who's helped to make some hard times easier for me."

"Happy to meet you, Miss Preston," beamed Rock, over his load of bundles.

"How do you do, Mr. Rock," returned Thiry, with just a hint of mischief in her gray eyes.

THEY went out together, and Trueman felt that he was soaring to the blue sky. Outside in the sunshine he could see her better, and it was as if some magic had transformed her. Really, he had not seen her at all. He felt more deceitful than ever, for he kept turning to her to say ordinary things, about the heat, the dust, and what not, when he only wanted to look at her.

They soon reached the end of the street, and started across an open flat toward the corrals.

"You're in an awful hurry," finally complained Trueman.

"Yes, I am. I'm late, and you don't know—"

She did not complete the sentence, but nevertheless it told Rock much.

"This load is heavy. You'd never have packed it," declared Trueman, slowing up. Any excuse was better than none. He was going to lose this wonderful girl in another moment. He wanted to prolong it. Slyly, he pinched a hole in the bag of rice and it began to spill out in a thin stream.

"There! We've rushed so we've broken the sack," he went on. "And it's the rice, too! . . . Miss Thiry, it's an omen."

"Mr. Rock, I fear you are many things beside a clerk," she said, shaking her head sadly. "Here, let me take the bag. I'll turn it upside down. If I had far to go with you, I'd have no groceries left."

"But wouldn't it be great if we had farther to go?" he asked.

"I can't see that it would," she replied, dubiously. "Especially if my dad was at the end of the walk."

"Your dad. Is he a terror?"

"Indeed he is—to boys who come gallivanting after me."

By this time they had reached the first corral. The big gate swung ajar. The fence was planked and too high to see over. Loud voices and thud of hoofs came from somewhere, probably the second corral. Thiry led the way in. Rock espied some saddle horses, a wagon, and then a double-seated buckboard, hitched to a fine-looking team of roans.

"HERE we are," said the girl, with evident relief. "No one come yet! I'm glad. . . . Put the bundles under the back seat, Mr. Rock."

He did as directed, and then faced her, not knowing what to say, fearing the mingled feelings that swept over him, and bewildered by them.

"After all you've been very kind—even if—"

"Don't say if," he broke in, entreatingly. "Don't spoil it by a single if. It's been the greatest adventure of my life."

"Of many like adventures, no doubt," she replied, her clear gray eyes on him.

"I've met many girls in many ways; but there has never been anything like this," he returned tensely.

"Mr. Rock!" she protested, lifting a hand to her cheek, where a wave of scarlet burned.

Then a clink of spurs, slow steps, and thuds of hoofs sounded behind Rock. They meant nothing particular to him until he saw the girl's color fade and her face turn white. A swift shadow darkened the great gray eyes.

"Hyar she ish, Range," called out a coarse voice, somehow vibrant, despite a thick hint of liquor. "With 'nother galoot, b'gosh. Schecond one terday."

Slowly Rock turned on his heel, and in the turning went back to the original self that had been in abeyance for a while. When it came to dealing with men he was not a clerk.

Two riders had entered the corral, and the foremost was in the act of dismounting. He was partly drunk; but that was not the striking thing about him. He looked and breathed the very spirit of the range at its wildest. He was tall, lean, lithe, with a handsome red face, eyes hot as blue flame, and yellow hair that curled scraggily from under a dusty black sombrero. He had just been clean-shaved. Drops of blood and sweat stood out like beads on his lean jowl, and his curved lips. A gun swung below his hip.

The other rider, called Range, was a cowboy, young in years, with still gray eyes like Miss Preston's, and intent, expressionless face, dark from sun and wind. Rock gathered, from the resemblance, that this boy was Thiry's brother. But who was the other?

"Thiry, who's thish?" queried the rider, dropping his bridle and striding forward.

"I can introduce myself," struck in Rock coolly. "I'm Trueman Rock, late of Texas."

"You don' shay!" returned the other, ponderingly, as if trying to fit the name to something in memory. "Whash you doin' hyar?"

"Well, if it's any of your business, I was in Winter's store, and packed over Miss Preston's bundles," replied Rock, in slow, dry speech.

"Haw! Haw!" guffawed the rider, derisively. Who was this man? Surely not a lover! The thought seemed to cut fiercely into Rock's inner flesh. "Wal," went on the tall rider presently, swaggering closer to Rock, "run along, Big Hat, 'fore I reach you with a boot."

"Ash! You're drunk!" burst out the girl.

THE disgust and scorn and fear, and something else in her outbreak, instantly gave Rock tight rein on his own feelings. This rider, then, was Ash Preston, of whom Rock had heard significantly that day. Her brother! The relief Rock experienced outstressed anything else for the moment.

"Whosh drunk?" queried Preston placatingly of his sister. "Your mistake, Thiry."

"Yes, you are drunk," she returned with heat. "You've insulted Mr. Rock, who was kind enough to help me carry things from the store."

"Wal, I'll help Mishter Rock on his way," replied Preston, leering.

Range, the other rider, like a flash leaped out of his saddle.

"Ash, you look out," he called sharply. "You don't know the fellar."

"Whash the thunder I care. He's Big Hat, an' I'm a-goin' to chase him pronto."

Thiry Preston stepped out as if impelled, yet she was evidently clamped with fear. "Please, Ash, be decent, if you can't be a gentleman," begged Thiry.

For answer Preston lurched by Thiry, and swept out a long, slow arm, with open hand aimed at Rock's face. But Rock dodged, and at the same time stuck out his foot dexterously. The rider, his momentum unchecked, tripped and lost his balance. He fell slowly, helplessly, and striking on his shoulder, he rolled over in the dirt. He sat up ludicrously and wiping the dust off his cheek he extended a long arm, with shaking hand, up at Rock.

"WANTED . . . A $10,000 executive . . ."

TAKE an honest inventory of yourself. Where do you stand in your business today? What are your prospects? Who or what stands between you and advancement? Will you be any further ahead a year from now, and if not, why not? What is the secret of the success of the men at the head of your business? Would you be picked to replace any one of them? The crying need of every business today is men of ability plus.

COAST TO COAST SERVICE

"Shay, you hit me, fellar."

"Preston, you're quite wrong. I didn't," replied Rock.

"Whash you hit me with?" he went on, sure that indignity had been committed upon him.

"I didn't hit you with anythin'."

"Range, is this hyar Big Hat lyin' to me?"

"Nope. You jest fell over him," returned the younger rider, laconically.

"Ash, you're so drunk you can't stand up," interposed Thiry.

"Wal, stranger, I'm 'ceptin' your apology."

"Thanks. You're sure considerate," returned Rock, with sarcasm. He was not used to total restraint, and he could not remember when any man had jarred him so. Turning to the girl he said, "I'll go. Good-by, Miss Preston."

WITH his back to the brothers Trueman made his eyes speak a great deal more than his words. The dullest of girls would have grasped that he did not mean good-by forever. Thiry's response to his gaze was a silent one of regret, of confusion, of something more, of which she was unconscious.

Rock stepped up on the corral fence, reached the top rail, and vaulted over. Outside he saw men and horses coming, and was glad that they were not in line with him. Thoughts and emotions almost overwhelmed him.

"Ash Preston! Bad medicine! And he's her brother!" muttered Rock aloud. "Sure as fate we're goin' to clash."

He halted on a street corner long enough to see the buckboard, the wagon, and several mounted riders move away briskly toward the south. Rock's sharp eye picked out Thiry's white dress and blue bonnet. Amazing and stirring was it to Rock that she turned to look back. Then quickly the little cavalcade passed out of sight behind trees.

He strode back to Sol Winter's store.

"Now, son, what's happened?" queried Sol with concern.

"Lord knows; I don't," panted Rock, spilling off his sombrero and wiping his face. "But it's—a lot."

"True, you took a shine to Thiry Preston. I seen that. No wonder. She's the sweetest lass who ever struck these parts."

"Sol, we'll investigate my state of mind last," replied Rock ruefully. "Listen! I ran into the Preston outfit. At least, into two of them: Thiry's brothers, Range and Ash." And he related to his friend all that had occurred at the corral.

"Aw! Too bad for Thiry. She's always bein' humiliated. No wonder she comes to town so seldom. Why, Rock, she's liked by everybody in this town."

"Liked! Sol, you old geezer, this here town ought to do better than that. . . . But I sure agree with you. Too bad for Miss Thiry. Oh, she felt hurt. I saw tears run down her cheeks."

"An' you took water from that Ash Preston?" mused Winter.

"I sure did. Gee, it felt queer. But I'd 'a' taken a beatin' for that girl."

"Rock, you have changed. You're bigger, stronger. You've grown—"

"Hold on, Sol. Don't make me out so much that you'll have to crawl later. But if I have improved a little, I'm thankin' the Lord. . . . Sol, I meant to get terrible drunk till that girl stepped in this store."

"An' now you don't?"

"Lord! I wouldn't take a drink for a million dollars," replied Rock, with a ring in his voice. "You should have seen Thiry's face—have heard her when she said, 'Ash—you're drunk.'"

"Yes, I know. Thiry hates drink. She has cause. Most of the Prestons are a drinkin' lot . . . But, son, are you serious? Has bein' with Thiry Preston for a little while changed your ideas about red liquor?"

"Sol, it sure has. I don't know just what's happened to me; but that you can gamble on."

"Son, it sounds good. If it isn't just excitement. . . . Why, 'most every young fellar—an' some older ones—in this country have been struck by lightnin' when they first seen Thiry. But I can't see that it did them good. For they drank only the harder. Thiry isn't to be courted, they say."

"Struck by lightnin'. Sure, that might be it. But never you mind about me. I want to know all about this Preston outfit. You can trust me. I'm back here for good and I'm goin' to help you. So, come out with everythin'."

"Same old Rock," mused Winter. "No; not the same, either. There's a difference I can't name yet. Wal, this Preston outfit is sure prominent in these parts. They call them 'The Thirteen Prestons of Sunset Pass.' It's a big family. Nobody seems to know where they come from. Anyway, they drove a herd of cattle in here some time after you left. An', 'ceptin' Ash Preston, they're just about the most likable outfit you ever seen. Fact is, they're like Thiry. So you don't need to be told more about that. They located in Sunset Pass, right on the Divide. You know the place. An' it wasn't long until they were known all over the range. Wonderful outfit, with horses and ropes."

"Go on, Sol. It's like a story to me. What was the trouble you had?"

"THEY ran up a big bill in my store. The old store, you remember. I taxed the boys about it. Well, it was Ash Preston who raised the trouble. He wasn't drunk then. An', son, you need to be told that Ash is wild when he's drunk. When sober he's—well, he's different. . . . Nick was alone in the store. Nick was a spunky lad, you know, an' he razzed Ash somethin' fierce. Result was, Ash piled the lad in a corner an' always hated him afterward. Fact is, the range talk says Ash Preston hates everybody except Thiry. She's the only one who can do anythin' with him."

"She didn't do a whole lot to-day. The drunken— And Nick was shot off his horse out there in Sunset Pass?"

"Yes. An' I never breathed to anyone my natural suspicion. I think Ash Preston must have killed Nick. They must have met an' fought it out. There were four empty shells, fresh shot, in Nick's gun."

"The boy had nerve and he was no slouch with a six-shooter. I wonder—"

"Well, Gage paid the bill first time he came to town. Then for a while he didn't buy from me. But one day Thiry came in, an' ever since I've sold goods to the Prestons. But none of them save Thiry have ever been in my store since. She does the orderin', an' she pays pronto."

"Ahuh . . . Any range talk among the punchers about these Prestons?"

"Well, son, there used to be no more than concerned the Culvers, or Tolls, or Smiths, an' not so much as used to be about the little outfits down in the woods. You know the range. All the outfits eat each other's cattle. It was a kind of unwritten code. But, lately, the last two years, conditions have gone on the same, in that way, an' some different in another. I hear a good deal of complaint about the rustlin' of cattle. An' a few dark hints about the Prestons have seeped in to me off the range.

"Darn few, mind you, son, an' sure vague an' untrailable. It might be owin' to the slow gettin' rich of Gage Preston. Not so you could see it much in cattle, but in land an' money in bank. I happen to know he has a bank account in Los Vegas. That's pretty far off, you know, an' it looks queer to me. Found it out by accident. I buy from a wholesale grocer in Los Vegas. He happened here, an' in a talk dropped that bit of information. It's sure not known here in Wagontongue, an' I'm askin' you to keep it under your hat."

"Is Gage Preston one of these lone cattle men?" queried Rock thoughtfully.

"Not now, but he sure was once."

"Who's he in with now?"

"John Dabb. They own the Bar X outfit. It's not so much. Dabb has the big end of it. Then Dabb runs a butcher shop. Fact is, he undersold me an' put me out of that kind of business. He buys mostly from Preston An' he ships a good many beeves."

"Ships? Out of town?" asked Rock, in surprise.

"I should smile! They have worked into a considerable business, with prospects. I saw this opportunity years ago, but didn't have the capital."

Rock pondered over his friend's disclosures, and Thiry Preston's sad face returned to haunt him.

"SOL, what do you think about Ash Preston?" asked Rock.

"Well, son, I'm sure curious to ask you that same question," replied Winter. "How did this fellow strike you?"

"Like a hard fist, right in the eye," acknowledged Rock.

"Ahuh. I'm glad your sojourn in Texas hasn't dulled your edge," said Winter, with satisfaction. "Rock, the Prestons are all out of the ordinary. Take Thiry, for instance. How did she strike you?"

Trueman placed a slow, heavy hand on the region of his heart, and gazed at his friend, as if words were useless.

"Well, I wouldn't give two bits for you if she hadn't. Son, I've a hunch your comin' back means a lot. . . . Wal, to go on—these Prestons are a mighty strikin' outfit. An' Ash Preston stands out, even among them. He can drink more, fight harder, shoot quicker than any man in these parts. He's sure the meanest, coldest, nerviest, deadliest proposition you're likely to stack up against in your life. I just want to give you a hunch, seein' you went sweet on Thiry."

"Thanks, old friend. Forewarned is forearmed, you know. The man was drunk when I met him; but I think

When Thomas Edison groped in the dark

IN 1859 Edison was a newsboy on the trains in and out of Detroit. He spent every hour he could spare in the public library "grappling bravely with a certain section, and trying to read it through consecutively, shelf by shelf, regardless of subject."

Admirable determination! Edison was destined to be well read, just as he was destined to become the greatest inventor of all time. But his early desire for fine reading was a blind groping in the dark. The books in a modern public library would take fifty lifetimes to read!

Now everyone can be well read

Just as America's greatest inventor brought light into the world through the great medium, electricity—America's greatest educator brought light to everyone through the medium of good reading. Dr. Charles W. Eliot, from his lifetime of study, selected the pure gold from the world's literature. Into a single set he assembled the essentials of a liberal education, the books that everyone must know to be well read. In the Five-Foot Shelf are the carefully selected writings of 302 immortal authors.

DR. ELIOT'S FIVE-FOOT SHELF OF BOOKS

(The Harvard Classics)

Carlyle once said, "If time is precious, no book that will not improve by repeated readings deserves to be read at all." Time nowadays is more precious than ever before. We cannot, like the young Edison, attack the countless shelves of public libraries. Probably none of us possesses the persistency and patience which guided his early reading. We must have only the really great literature, the books that make us think straight, talk clearly and increase both our power to succeed and our enjoyment of life.

The Harvard Classics answer these requirements to the last detail. Already they are read and cherished in thousands of cultured homes. They are constantly bringing keen enjoyment and deeper understanding into busy lives. "Reading," as Edison himself says, "will never take the place of doing, but it enables us to travel twice as far with half the effort."

The Five-Foot Shelf is not a "rich man's library." By the famous Collier plan these wonderful books are brought within easy reach of everyone. Do not put off finding out more about this invaluable set. Mail the coupon today!

I grasped a little of what you say."

Winter evidently found more in this reply to worry him.

"Well, then, you know what the risk is."

"Sol, what do I care for risks?" burst out Rock contemptuously.

"True, you always were a sudden cuss; but even so, you could hardly get serious, real serious, over Thiry Preston so quick. Really sweet on her."

"Sweet on that girl! No! I've been sweet on a hundred girls. This is different. I don't know what. But it's somethin' terrible. Ten thousand times sweet!"

"Son, you needn't bite my head off," protested Winter. "If you want to know, I'm tickled stiff—an' scared to death. I love that girl. An', if you haven't forgot, I was once some fond of you."

"Sol, I haven't forgotten," replied Rock, with warmth. "But don't you dare ever mention my—my old girl friends. And if you'd dare to tell Thiry, I'd murder you."

"Somebody will tell her, son. For instance, Mrs. John Dabb. She likes Thiry. She'll tell her. I see them together occasionally."

"Mrs. John Dabb. She couldn't know much."

"I told you she was Amy Wund."

"Ow!" wailed Rock, bending double.

"Trueman, your trail will sure be rough," returned Winter.

"Listen, old friend. There's only one thing that could stump me. Tell me. Do you know Thiry real well?"

"Yes, son, an' I can answer that question so plain in your eyes. Thiry is not in love with anybody. I know, because she told me herself, not so long ago. She loves her family, especially Ash. But there's no one else."

"That'll . . . help. Now, I'll go off somewhere and try to find out what's the matter with me—and what to do about it!"

TRUEMAN sallied forth into the sunlight like a man possessed. He did not notice the heat while he was striding out of town; but when he got to the cedars and mounted a slope to a lonely spot, he was grateful for the cool shade. He threw aside coat and sombrero, and lay down on the fragrant mat of cedar needles. How good to be there!

Rock always went to the loneliness and silence of desert or forest when in any kind of trouble. He had not been in this shady spot for five minutes before the insidious spell of nature prevailed. He could think here.

Only one thing had stood in the way of a happy return to Wagontongue, and that had been possibility of a clash with Cass Seward, the sheriff. It had been reckless, perhaps foolish, for him to come back, when he had known that the probabilities were that Cass would try to make him show yellow and clap him in jail, because of a shooting affray which Rock had not started. But it had been Rock's way to come, not knowing. And that hazard was past. Rock paid tribute to the dead sheriff, and gladly welcomed the fact that he had a clean slate before him.

That gray-eyed girl, Thiry Preston! Here he did surrender. He had been struck through the heart. And all the fight there was seemed directed against himself—a wavering, lessening doubt that he could be as marvelously transformed as he thought. And then, one by one, in solemn procession, there passed before his memory's eye the other girls he had known, trifled with, liked, or loved. A few stood out brightly. He watched them pass by, out of the shade, it seemed, into the past forever.

Thiry Preston had made them vanish, as if by magic. Trueman did not sentimentalize or argue about it. She was the girl. All his life he had been dreaming of her. Nor did he ask himself any questions about love. Whatever it was, it had been sudden, inevitable, and fearsome only in its premonition of tremendous might.

This was not decision, but a realization and acceptance. Decision had to do with remaining at or near Wagontongue, and it was made the instant the question presented. He would ask Gage Preston for a job, riding, and if one was not available he would ask some other cattle man. Not likely was it that any rancher thereabouts would not find a place for Trueman Rock. In such event, however, he could go into the cattle business himself.

The thought of Ash Preston was disturbing. Rock had a premonition that he would have trouble with Preston; but he refused to harbor it. He absolutely must not fight with Thiry's brother.

AT LENGTH Rock left the cedar nook and started to retrace his steps toward town and Winter's store. His friend was busy with customers, so Rock betook himself toward the hotel. A young woman coming out of Dabb's large establishment almost ran into Rock.

"Excuse me," he said, touching his hat.

"True Rock—aren't you going to speak to me?" she burst out.

He knew the voice, the face too, the dark, sparkling, astonished eyes.

"True, don't you know me?" she asked, with mingled reproach and gayety. "It's Amy."

"Why, Mrs. Dabb, this is a surprise," he said, doffing his sombrero, and bowing over her hand. "I'm sure glad to see you."

"Mrs. Dabb? Not Amy?" she rejoined, with a captivating smile and look that Rock found strangely familiar.

"Someone told me you were married to my old boss, John Dabb," said Rock, easily. "You sure look well and fine. And prosperous, too?"

She did not like his penetrating gaze and his slow, cool speech.

"True, I can return the compliment. You are handsomer than ever."

"Thanks."

"True, you're not glad to see me!" she rejoined, almost petulantly.

"Why, sure I am. Glad you're settled and happy and—"

"Happy! Do I look that?" she interrupted bitterly.

"If my memory's any good, you look as gay and happy as ever."

"Your memory is bad—about that—and other things . . . Trueman, have you come back on a visit?"

"No, I aim to stay. I always was comin' back."

"If you only had come!" she sighed, and looked eloquently up at him. "I'm glad, terribly glad, you're going to stay. We must be good friends again, True. You'll come to see me, ride with me, like you used to. Won't you?"

"I'm afraid Mr. Dabb wouldn't like that. He never had any use for me."

"It doesn't matter what he likes! Say you will, Trueman. I'm horribly lonesome."

Rock remembered that Amy had always been a flirt. Evidently she had not changed. But he was sorry for her, and wished to spare her discomfiture.

"I'll call on you and John sometime," he replied, with all friendliness.

"Me and—John! . . . Well, your long absence in Texas hasn't made you any brighter. I dare say it hasn't changed you any—about girls, either. I saw you with Thiry Preston. At your old tricks, cowboy!"

"Did you? I don't call it old tricks to carry a few bundles for a girl," replied Rock stiffly. It annoyed him to feel the blood heat his face.

"Bundles, rot!" she retorted. "I saw you through a window, and anybody could have read your mind. Oh, I know you, True Rock, inside and out. You've lost your head pronto over Thiry Preston."

"I'm not denyin' it, am I?"

"You're flaunting it like a red flag right in my face. Well, I'm telling you, cowboy, that this once you've lost your head for nothing. Thiry Preston will have none of you. I know her. She is not your kind. She's cold as ice to every cowboy on this range. Heaven knows, they've run after her."

"Thanks for that last news, anyhow," he responded dryly.

She was searching the very depths of him, her eyes keen with jealous intuition.

"More. Thiry Preston has no use for lovesick cowboys, much less one like you, who've been at the beck and call of every girl in the land. And she worships that handsome demon of a brother, Ash."

"I'd hold it a virtue for a girl to love her brother—whether he was bad or good. . . . Good day, Mrs. Dabb." And, replacing his sombrero, he turned away, not, however, without catching a last angry blaze of her eyes.

She would be his enemy, of that he was full sure, unless he allowed himself once more to be attached to her train. The idea was preposterous. In a few short hours—no, they were hours incalculably long in their power—he had grown past flirting with any woman. Life had suddenly become sweet, strange, full of fears and hopes, something real and poignant, such as he had never experienced before.

ROCK, instead of entering the hotel, returned to Winter, whom he found unoccupied, and proceeded to unburden himself. He told the last thing first.

"So you run into Amy," meditated Sol, with a thoughtful twinkle. "Reckon you might have expected that. An' she knocked the wind out of you?"

"She sure did. You see, I'd really forgotten Amy."

"Wal, son, take my advice and keep shy of Amy. She's got old Dabb so jealous he can't attend to his business. She always has some buckaroo runnin' after her. That won't do for you. The Dabbs aboot own Wagontongue, not to say a lot of the range outfits. Sure, John's brothers are ruled by him. I told you he bought beef from Gage Preston. Then I always see Thiry with Amy, when she comes to town. If you aim to snub your old girl for this new one—wal, son, you'll have a rough row to hoe."

"I'll not snub Amy; but I can't go playin' 'round with her. . . . Sol, how much money do you owe?"

"Couple of thousand; an' when that's paid off I'll be on the road to prosperity again."

"Old-timer, you're on it right now. I'll take that much stock in your business," went on Rock, as he took out his pocketbook.

"Son, I don't want you to do that," protested Winter.

"But I want to. I think it's a good investment. Now, here's your two thousand. And here's five more, which I want you to put in your bank, on interest; but fixed so you can draw it out quick. Reckon we'd better add another thousand to that five. I only need enough money to buy a spankin' outfit."

"Son, suppose somethin' happened to you," said Winter gravely, as he fingered the money. "It might. You know this is a sudden country. An', Rock, you've got fire in your eye."

"Sol, my parents are livin'; an' though old, they're in good health. They live in Illinois. Town of Carthage. If anythin' should happen to me—which I'm gamblin' it won't—you send this six thousand to my folks. I'll leave the address with you. Also, some papers and things for safe-keepin'."

"An' how about the two thousand you're investin' with me?"

"You can just forget about that, pardner."

Winter shook his lean old head sagaciously. "Wal, son, out with it. What's under that big hat?"

"I'm goin' to be a plain cowpuncher, and start in where I left off here six years ago. But I want a jim-dandy outfit; two saddle horses—the best on the range, if money can buy them."

"We can find one of them pronto," replied Winter, with satisfaction. "After supper we'll walk out to Leslie's. He's sellin' out, an' he has some good stock. One horse in particular. I never saw his beat. Dabb has been haggling' with Leslie over the price. It's high, but the horse is worth it."

"How much?"

"Three hundred."

"ALL right, Sol. We'll buy. But I reckon one saddle horse will do. Then I'll need a pack horse and outfit. In the mornin' we'll pick out a tarp and blankets, grub and campin' outfit. I've got saddle, bridle, spurs, riata—all Mexican, Sol, and if they don't knock the punchers on this range, I'll eat them. My Texas pardner gave them to me. And, last, I reckon I'll require some more hardware."

"Ahuh! . . . An' with all this outfit you're headin' for Sunset Pass."

"Yeah. I'm goin' to ride down slow and easy-like. Then I'll end up at Gage Preston's and strike him for a job."

"Son, it's a bold move, if it's all on account of Thiry. Gage Preston can't hardly refuse you a job. He needs riders. He has hired about every cowpuncher on the range. But they don't last. Ash gets rid of them, sooner or later. Reckon about as soon as they shine up to Thiry."

"How does he do that?" queried Rock, curiously.

"Wal, he scares most of them. Some he has bunged up with his fists. An' several punchers he's driven to throw guns."

"Kill them?"

"Nope. They say he just crippled them. Ash shoots quick an' where he wants."

"Most interestin' cuss—Ash Preston," said Rock lightly.

"Son, this is what worries me," went on Winter, with gravity: "it'll be some different when Ash Preston butts into you. No matter how easy an' cool you start, no matter how clever you are, it's bound to wind up a deadly business."

"Thanks, old-timer. I get your hunch. I'm takin' it serious and strong. Don't worry unreasonable about me. I've got to go."

TRUEMAN ROCK was not one of the cowboy breed who cared only for pitching, biting, kicking horses. He could ride them, when exigency demanded, but he never loved a horse for other than thoroughbred qualities. And sitting on the corral fence watching Leslie's white favorite, he was bound to confess that he felt emotions of his earliest days on the range.

"Wal, True, did you ever see the beat of that hoss?" asked Sol Winter, for the twentieth time.

Rock shook his head silently. Then, "I'll take him, Leslie, and consider the deal a lastin' favor," he said.

"Mrs. Dabb has been wantin' this hoss, didn't you tell me, Jim?" asked Winter.

"Wal, I reckon so. She has been out here often. But I don't think Mrs. Dabb really cared about the horse so much. She just wanted to show off on him. But to-day there was a girl here who loved him, an' I'd shore have liked to let her have him."

"Who was she, Jim?" asked Winter.

"Thiry Preston. She passed here to-day with her dad an' some of the boys. Gage stopped to have a talk with me."

"What did Miss Preston do?" queried Rock, casually.

"She just petted the hoss while the other Prestons walked around talkin'. Miss Thiry never said a word. But I seen her heart in her eyes."

"Speaks well for her," replied Rock, with constraint, as he slid off the fence and approached the animal. If this beautiful white horse had appeared desirable in his eyes upon first sight, what was he now? Rock smoothed the silky mane, thrilling at the thought that Thiry's gentle hand had rested there. "Leslie, I'll come in the mornin'. I want a pack-horse or a mule . . . Here's your money. Shake on it."

"I'll throw the pack-hoss in to boot," replied Leslie.

"Sol," said Rock, thoughtfully, as they retraced their steps toward town, "do the Prestons come in often?"

"Some of them every Saturday, shore as it rolls round. Thiry comes in about twice a month."

"Pretty long ride in from Sunset. Sixty miles by trail. Reckon the Prestons make a one-night stop at some ranch?"

"No. They camp it, makin' Cedar Creek, where they turn off into a flat. Good grass an' water. There's an old cabin. It belonged to a homesteader. Preston owns it now. Thiry was tellin' me they'd fixed it up. When they're comin' to town, she an' the other women-folks sleep there, an' the men throw beds outside."

"Queer how all about these Prestons interests me so," said Rock.

"Not so queer. Leavin' Thiry aside, they're a mighty interestin' outfit. You'll find that so, pronto."

"Reckon I'll find out a lot, pronto," said Trueman. "Never could keep things from comin' my way, particularly trouble. But, Sol, in all my life no adventure I ever rode down on could touch this one. I'm soberin' a little and realize how crazy it seems to you."

"Not crazy, son," replied Winter, earnestly. "It's wild, perhaps, to let yourself go over this girl all in a minute. But then, wild or no, it might turn out good for Thiry Preston."

"Sol, why is her face so sad?"

"I don't know. I've asked her why she looks sad—which you can see when she's not speakin'; but she always makes herself smile an' laugh then. Says she can't help her face, an' she's sorry I don't like it. Rock, it hurts Thiry, sort of startles her, to mention that. It makes her think of somethin' unhappy."

"It's for me to find out," said Rock.

"You bet. I've always been puzzled an' troubled over Thiry. My wife, too. An' it'll please you that she took kindly to your sudden case over Thiry. True, I may be wrong thinkin' you've growed to be a man . . . But one last word: These Prestons have heard all about you, naturally, an' when you ride out on the range it'll all come fresh again. No cowboy ever had a finer reputation than you—for bein' keen an' honest an' clean, an' a wonder at your work. You never drank much, compared to most cowboys.

"But your gun record was bad. Forgive me, son, I don't want to offend. Remember, I'm your friend. Every old-timer here knows you never went around lookin' for trouble. It's not that kind of a bad reputation. It's this kind: You've spilled blood on this range, often, an' more'n once fatal. That made you loved by a few, feared an' misunderstood by many, an' a mark for every fame-huntin' sheriff, gambler, an' cowpuncher in the country.

"Now you're back again, after some years, an' all you ever done here will come up. An' your Texas doin's, whatever they were, will follow you. . . . Now, the point I want to make is this: Preston knows most of this, or will know it soon, an' if he keeps you in his outfit it will be pretty strong proof that these queer dark hints from the range are without justification."

"SOL, it would seem so," replied Rock, meditatively.

"Wal, it'll be good if you find it that way. For Thiry's sake first, an' then for everybody concerned. Then these hints against Preston will be little different from those concernin' other ranchers—just gossip."

Rock regarded his anxious friend a thoughtful moment. "Winter," he said, "you've made a point you weren't calculatin' on. You're hopin' I'll find Preston one of the common run of ranchers. But you're afraid I won't!"

The only successful men who hate soap and water

No doubt one reason a tramp is always dirty is that his "work" requires it. The real one, though, is that he has lost his self-respect—or given it a kick.

Here's a thought for some welfare organization: Catch all the hoboes; wash 'em; keep 'em washed; result—eventually no more hoboes.

And there honestly is something in the idea. For cleanliness and self-respect are just about the same thing. Any time you feel like questioning it, try starting your day with soiled linen or without a bath.

Why I Don't Go to Church (or) Why I Do Go to Church

FIRST PRIZE

I'd Like to Go, But—

TIMES have changed since Father used to hitch old Dobbin to the shay, and Mother reinforced herself with a footwarmer, and we all piled in under the old buffalo robe and set out for church with the expectation of a service three hours long.

My grandfather was a Presbyterian minister who believed in long sermons as a means of eternal salvation. My father was an Episcopal rector, who took his religion a little more easily. Between the two, I could no more escape going to church on Sunday morning than I could get away from my mother and the toothbrush. Sometimes I used to steal away and go to church with some Methodist friends, and would sing "Hallelujah!" as lustily as any of them. I always liked the good old hymns, and still think that everyone should go to church at least once on Sunday. Any church is better than none.

But the years have changed all this. Sunday now means more hard work for me than all the other days of the week put together. If I were offered a job at one hundred dollars a week, to work as hard each day as I work on Sunday, I doubt if I would be physically able to take it, much as I need the money.

I go to business during the week. This leaves one day to do everything around the house in. Here is a schedule of my Sundays, which seldom varies:

In the morning I do my washing. While it is drying, I clean my two rooms and bath, which always need it. Where all the dirt comes from, goodness only knows, but, judging from the dirt I sweep up and the dust which accumulates, one would think that the entire United States Army trooped through the place every day. Most of the afternoon I iron. Then I get something to eat, read the papers, take a bath, and after this I am absolutely too tired to do anything but rest and wonder how it would feel to be rich.

And yet some of my friends wonder why I do not go to church twice a day and help them sing "Sweet Day of Rest."

M. A. H.

SECOND PRIZE

The Church is My Best Friend

"IF THE Church can do anything with that young devil it is welcome to him." So said some of the men in the factory when they heard that I had "got religion," and was going to join the Church.

As a boy, I started to work in a cotton factory at eleven years of age, and my education ended at the fifth grade. At sixteen, I was frequenting cheap dance halls and gaming-rooms, and belonged to a rowdy gang of youths. Neighbors predicted that I would be no good to myself or to anybody else.

One Sunday night, it rained so incessantly that I was driven from the streets, and turned into a church for shelter. Under the earnest pleading of a working-man preacher I turned my back on my old life, and made a fresh start.

The men in that church encouraged me to teach a class of younger boys, and the minister, who directed my simple studies, loaned me the first worth-while books I ever read. In the months that followed, when bad habits were being mastered, and a self-respecting, ambitious young man was evolving out of the former "Canal Street" tough, the minister and members of the church were friends indeed. During this time I was living down a bad name, and I often became discouraged. There were lapses, too, that did not reflect credit on religion or on the Church. But there was no condemnation—only sympathy, and encouragement.

The Church and its message gave me a sense of my own dignity and worth, and the consciousness of a purpose in life. It opened the door of the academy; set me at the foot of the educational ladder, and helped me climb it.

The Church is not perfect. It has made many mistakes. Its teaching is not always adapted to the needs of the age, and at times it does not make full use of its opportunities. But I love it, and will be true to it as long as I live, for the Church has been a friend to me.

D. S.

THIRD PRIZE

I Don't Like the Church Because of Its "Rule of Terror"

I AM one of the skeptical, sophisticated, and thoroughly reprehensible younger generation. I also belong to the class from whence come the atheists, suicides, and so forth—the collegians. I attend an engineering university, boiled and steeped in mathematics. We believe nothing until we have proved it beyond a doubt, and even then we are inclined to use a factor of safety. There is a belief that colleges contain many atheists, although most of the so-called atheists are like myself: they do not disbelieve. They are only disgusted with the present system.

But that has nothing to do with my reasons for not attending church. I don't go to church for one reason—I don't like its autocracy.

I once heard an older man praising a rather famous preacher he had heard the night before:

"He certainly put the fear of God into that crowd."

And the speaker seemed to think that he had cited the prime requisite for a successful divine. Perhaps he was right. A church wants a man who can teach the love of God in such a manner that the grocer and the plumber will reach trembling hands into their pockets for their tithes. Teach them so they will fear to do anything but love Him. In this way, they may build up power, and the Church loves power.

Another evidence of autocracy is the Sunday-school, one of the most innocent in appearance, yet one of the most harmful manifestations of religion. "Catch 'em young and tell 'em nothing" seems to be the motto of these weekly meetings for the forced injections of biased views. Tell them nothing about any creed but the one in which the superintendent believes. Take them at an impressionable age, so they can have no other ideas except the ones which are fed them. To make sure they get the offspring at the right age, they start with a cradle roll, and continue the doses until the adult dies. Thus they assure themselves of a deep-seated prejudice in the individual for one religion, even one sect. When he starts at some time in his life to use reason or logic with himself, something within him cries out to stop. Sometimes he thinks of this as intuition, and that his old creed is best, after all; so he stops thinking and settles back in his rut. It was really his conscience, a thing for which Sunday-school was responsible. Another soul saved? Yeh!

What This Church Contest Revealed

EDITOR'S NOTE: This contest, "Why I Do or Do Not Go to Church," brought in letters by the big basketfuls! Thousands of persons responded, each one eager to express his opinion in favor of or against church attendance. Those who do attend church constitute a majority of the contestants, but those who do not go were by no means a negligible number. A distinguished feature of the contest, aside from the great mass of letters, was the excellent good taste and good temper displayed by those who wrote to us. Out of these letters, pro and con, we culled the ten principal reasons why the writers do not go to church, and the ten principal reasons why they do go.

First, the ten leading reasons why they do not go:

1. They object to the ritual, as boresome or meaningless.
2. They prefer to worship in the open air.
3. They object to the insincerity of certain church members.
4. They object to what they call the commercialism of the church.
5. Church services call up painful childhood memories.
6. They stay away because of rows with the minister or with some church officer or member.
7. They have been sickened by revival meetings.
8. They like to sleep late.
9. Prefer to spend the day in some form of outing.
10. They regard much of the church service as superstition.

The ten reasons most frequently mentioned for attending church are these:

1. They were brought up to go.
2. Like to meet their friends at church.
3. Go as an example to their children.
4. Think it a wholesome thing to be identified with the church.
5. Like to sing hymns with the congregation.
6. Enjoy the beauty of the service.
7. Need the comfort the church can give in time of trouble.
8. Go to church to forget petty cares;
9. To find strength and inspiration;
10. To seek the peace "which passeth all understanding."

The fresh snowy whiteness of Laundry-washed clothes

When you turn back the snowy, spotless sheets that have come from your laundry, you know they not only look clean and feel clean, but are scientifically clean. Yet modern laundry service is simple. It is a story of unlimited quantities of filtered rainsoft water, plenty of pure soap, and scientific knowledge of how to use amazingly gentle equipment. Your clothes are washed without rubbing, and are rinsed in many baths, until every particle of loosened dirt is definitely removed from the fabric. There is a pronounced difference between professional and domestic laundering . . . . a difference that strongly emphasizes the fact that laundry-washed clothes must be cleaner, sweeter and longer-wearing. Visit a modern laundry and see for yourself why millions of home managers depend upon such laundries for relief from irksome washday toil.

The LAUNDRY does it best

Above—The heavy, rich suds which penetrates every fabric pore, gently softening and removing dirt, in a washer with glass-smooth inside surfaces. Left—How the hand of science helps protect your clothing . . . every laundry formula is worked out with prescription-like exactness.

Keeping Faith with American Women

The modern laundries which stand as sponsors for this series of informative advertisements belong to a great group of progressive institutions. Not only is this group endeavoring to tell you the illuminating facts about modern laundry service, but each modern laundry is earnestly striving to keep its methods on a level with the high standards and ideals reflected in these advertisements.

THE FAMILY'S PROBLEMS

How We Ended Forever a Fear That Haunts Many Families

THE fear that some day the family will find itself homeless haunted me for years. If death should take me from my wife and two children, they will go right on living in the pretty little house in New Mexico in which this is written.

For three years after Ethel and I were married, we paid $40 a month rent. We saved $16 a month, hoping to get enough to make a down payment on a house; but, somehow, whenever we got over the $100 mark, something always happened to wipe out our savings, and we had to start over again.

Ethel and I used to spend Sunday afternoons figuring how we could acquire a home. We read all the "A little down, and a little a month" advertisements. We even looked at a few houses—some for practically nothing down; but we didn't feel we could afford to be seen living in such houses.

Well, how could we get a house?

"Darn it! I'm a salesman," I said to Ethel one Sunday. "A clerk is a salesman. I'm going to sell ourselves, our prospects, our earning ability, and buy a house. I have a good job. I've held it seven years. We pay $40 a month rent; we save $16 a month, even though misfortune comes along regularly and picks it out of our hands again. But, anyway, we can, and have, put aside $16 a month. . . . Let's go pick out a house!"

"What! With only $85 in the bank?" Ethel laughed, dispiritedly.

"It isn't what's in the bank," I said, "it's what this family is worth as a going concern."

WE FOUND a half-dozen desirable houses. Ethel smiled every time we looked at one. But I methodically noted down the addresses of the owners or agents. The next afternoon I got an hour off from the drug store, and went to see two of the owners. The first wouldn't listen to me. The second, a woman, was more impressed.

My proposition to her was simple: I wanted a house. I could pay $40 a month on one. I had no money for a down payment; but if she would trust me, I would pay her $200 each year in addition to the $40 monthly payments. I asked her to investigate me, my record as an employee, our record as buyers on credit at the local stores. Shoestring business! Yes; but it worked!

Well, we moved into the house. Then I began to have The Fear. We were paying $40 a month on a $4,500 house. The owner had got her down payment by putting a $2,000 mortgage on the place. The $40 went to paying off this mortgage. This left $2,500 to be paid off after the mortgage was taken care of. The $200 annual payments were to apply on this $2,500 yet due her.

But, except the equity in the house—which could be cashed in on only by selling the place—we were accumulating nothing that would be of any big help to Ethel and the children in case I should die and leave her to support, raise, and educate the children. Even with my $6,000 of life insurance, on which I had been paying three years, Ethel and the children could become homeless, and the thought haunted me.

I asked a banker friend if he knew of any financial trick by which I could wipe out this fear forever.

"A mortgage redemption policy, or something that works the same way—guaranteeing payment of all the debts against your property in case of your death—is what you're looking for," he told me. "Or you can find insurance companies that will not only insure payments of the debts, but will give you a loan on your place at the same time. Why don't you get a loan, pay off your first mortgage; or, at least, reduce it?"

I got such a policy, and also a loan. We had been paying on the house for a year and, deducting the interest, had cut down the $2,000 first mortgage to less than $1,600. In addition, our owner had been paid her $200 and interest, as agreed. Our $4,500 home now had only about $3,990 against it.

TO OUR surprise, the insurance company handling the loan appraised the place at $5,400! Elbow grease did that! I had put in walks, painted the window sills a more harmonious color, and made a wonderful lawn. Ethel had put in shrubs and flowers, and had used her knowledge of interior decoration to good advantage.

"We'll lend you half of $5,400, which is $2,700," the insurance man told us.

We took the $2,700 and paid off the remaining $1,600 of the original $2,000 first mortgage. Then we took the remaining $1,100 of the $2,700 and paid $1,000 on the owner's $2,300 second mortgage, cutting it to $1,300. The other $100 of the loan went for clothing for the babies, the tag end of a doctor bill—and for a big feed at the best café in town, celebrating our move toward independence.

The payments on the $2,700 insurance mortgage remain, as before, $40 a month. The woman who owns the house has already had $3,000 out of it—the $2,000 from the original mortgage, and the $1,000 we paid her out of the insurance loan; so she is content to continue to get hers at the rate of $200 a year. Up to now we have made four of these annual $200 payments.

In only three and a half years more, we'll have her paid off. Then what we won't do to that first mortgage!

But, if I should lose my job, and couldn't make these payments? Well, don't forget I've been paying seven years on $6,000 worth of life insurance. That's my old backstop. If I had to, I could borrow enough on that policy to meet the payments for a few months. Hard luck couldn't knock us out in the first round, anyway. Old Man Insurance is refereeing this fight, and he's on our side! T. U. C.

A recent camera study of General Pershing at home

IT SEEMED as if all the seven hundred people in Laclede, Missouri, were down at the station some weeks ago when Number Four rolled in bearing a great American home to see the folks. White and black crowded to the rails, waving to the erect, square-jawed man in blue serge with sandy hair shading white, who smiled back happily, and searched among all the friendly faces, then stepped quickly forward, hand outstretched:

"We-e-e-ll, old John Crowder!" his voice rang, as he pumped vigorously the right arm of the substantial-looking citizen, who likewise chuckled delightedly, and cried:

"We-e-e-ll, old John Pershing!"—then, "Let's look at you! Why, you haven't changed so much. I'd know you anywhere."

Indeed, to most who saw him on that late January day, the boyhood friend's intuition seemed true, as such intuitions often are. The man in the blue serge suit whom they welcomed was less General Pershing than John Pershing, who had been a boy and a regular boy right there in Laclede.

All day he was John Pershing, greeting with the endearing "old" of boyhood, friends of fifty years before, linking arms with John Crowder and strolling to the swimming hole in Locust Creek, where once they outstunted each other, exploring an ancient pirates' cave, reminiscing with two delighted negroes whom he had taught in school at sixteen. At dinner in the "annex" of the new building of his boyhood's Methodist Church, he was John Pershing still.

About a board certainly festive, groaning with good things if ever board did, were leaders of Church and Village, more old friends, and the Methodist pastor, laughing and joking, asking, "John, do you remember?" with the jollity and pride wherewith generous people delight to warm the hearts of others. With no less jollity and pride, John Pershing laughed and joked and remembered and, as when a boy with the husky appetite won by farm work, fell upon the dinner which Laclede quite properly termed banquet. Upon his return to Washington, he told about it with gusto:

"Seriously," he said, leaning forward as he does when in earnest, "it was delicious. I never tasted anything better. The ladies of the Methodist Church cooked it, and they can cook when they try. I believe they are the best cooks in the world."

His blue eyes shone in reminiscence.

"They had roast turkey, crisp and brown and tender, and potatoes so flaky they crumbled when you touched them, and rolls that melted in your mouth, and jam and preserves and pickles—"

Words failed, eyes rolled expressively, and he sighed.

"Have you ever been West?" he asked. "They're great people out there."

He sat behind the mahogany desk in his office as chairman of the Battle Monuments Commission, on the second floor of the State, War and Navy Department Building, now tilted back in his chair, hands in the pockets of the same blue serge suit, talking happily, boyishly even, with a trace of Missouri drawl, about the home folks he had just seen. There came to me a memory of another time, with him behind a desk, almost the only furniture in a barrack room in Chaumont, which in early fall, 1917, had just become headquarters of the American Expeditionary Forces. This time he leaned forward, masterful jaw clenched, deepening furrows in the strong face.

"Who says the Western Front can't be broken?" he added indignantly. "The German lines can be broken; they must be broken; they will be broken."

Warfare of attrition was not in the Pershing lexicon. He left no doubt of that in the minds of the group of correspondents to whom he was speaking. Once outside the door, someone exclaimed: "Hard-boiled, isn't he? But a soldier all right, and a fighter. Maybe the Western Front can be broken, after all."

And of course it was.

SCARCELY the same man, I thought, the fighter with clenched jaw and fist and flashing eye, and the blue-serge-clad citizen enthusiastic over a Methodist church supper. Then came another memory of ten years ago:

A group of us stood on the steps of the rather modest house, called by courtesy château, in Chaumont, where the General made his home. We had just had lunch with the General—and had a good time. Some of his staff had "kidded" him mildly about being a few minutes late (his one bad "business habit"), and he in turn had kidded us about the unusual shine of our Sam Brownes, the unwonted pressedness of our uniforms.

Junius Wood of the Chicago "News," an old friend of Mexico days, had asked if it was true that once in the Philippines he had been caught with one pocket-flap unbuttoned. He had talked shop a little, plans and progress:

"But you mustn't quote me" this time, and had seemed even glad to get it off his chest. He had been frank, boyish even, rejoicing in the company, Then he had come to the door and said, "Come again, now that you've found the way," as one might in Laclede or a thousand other places.

"Say, he may be hard-boiled sometimes," a fellow newspaper man said to me; "but he's a good scout at that, isn't he? We had him wrong."

During those fierce war years, he wasn't the only one who, at one time or another, had John J. Pershing wrong. Those were years for the fighting soldier, when to be less meant weakness and failure and the lives of others. War is a grim thing, a terrible thing, that drives the iron into men's souls, or shatters them. It touched different men differently, and blinded some to all but the iron. That is why, then, and for long afterward, many of the very citizen-soldiers for whose well-being he fought Germans and Allies, thought of him—in ignorance of what war means—as disciplinarian. That they "had him wrong," that he was, underneath, "a good fellow at that," many had no idea, then or when they came home and told families and friends who won the war.

THAT is probably the principal reason why even today so many good Americans do not know one of their most famous fellow-citizens, as they would like. Then, so many pictures have shown him on ceremonious occasions demanding of a soldier ceremonious poses. Many thought of him as the victorious general, immaculate, rigid, austere, even forbidding, as some other great soldiers have been—that, and nothing more. So he is respected, admired, esteemed—but his human qualities not generally known.

That is one reason why today in Washington people are more eager for a look at General Pershing than at President Coolidge. At public functions more inquire for him than for anyone else. True, we have had thirty Presidents and but one General of the Armies, but to many he is still something of a mystery. They know the victorious general, but not John J. Pershing "as is."

That John J. Pershing is today, in his own words, "enjoying life in civilian clothes." Back from the wars, active service ended, now he can expand and devote himself to good talks with his friends, to good pictures, to (Continued on page 78)

Things I Can't Understand About Women

WE MEN have two ways of regarding women: with our hearts and with our minds. The first applies to the few for whom we have a real affection. But the second applies to all women! For our hearts don't put our brains out of commission, even in regard to the women we are fond of.

The only exception is when a man is blindly in love with some one woman. But that is merely a temporary mental eclipse. Sooner or later, he begins to think about her. She may still be the woman, but she is also just a woman. And in spite of his love, he is able to see in her some of the feminine qualities which puzzle and irritate him.

Women do things which are almost incomprehensible to the masculine mind. Some men struggle along for years, trying to cure their wives of feminine tendencies and habits. Others, more philosophical, manage to accept these peculiarities with tolerant amusement.

But there probably isn't a man alive who doesn't sometimes say that he "can't understand" why women do certain things, or do them in certain curious ways.

I have been sounding out my friends in regard to this matter, and each of them has contributed several items of interest. The showing probably is far from complete. But I think it gives a pretty fair cross-section of the mental attitude of men toward the peculiar little ways of women.

I want to make one preliminary explanation. Very often, after a man had spoken of some feminine trait which puzzled him, he would say: "I can understand why a woman might be inclined to do that; or why she might have done it a few times. But I can't understand why she would keep on doing it! Why doesn't she learn that it is foolish and perhaps irritating to others?"

By "others" of course he means men; especially himself. But why not? If women need us in their lives—and I suppose there can be no argument about that—why shouldn't they avoid unnecessary annoyance to us?

Now, right here is where one of these feminine traits is going to show itself! For at least ninety-nine out of a hundred women, when they have read the above paragraph, will make one and the same remark.

"Well!" they will exclaim indignantly. "If my husband tried half as hard to consider my feelings as I try to consider his, life would be a good deal easier and pleasanter for me!"

Instead of husband, you may have to substitute father, brother, son, fiancé, boss, or friend; whatever man happens to loom largest in the woman's daily scheme of things. But practically every woman's reaction will be the same in one essential. It will be a personal one.

THIS is something which we men cannot understand about women. Whenever a subject comes up for discussion, a woman doesn't talk impersonally. She twists things around so that the "discussion" becomes an argument about herself: her ideas, her motives, her actions. In this case, for example, mighty few women will stick to the text I gave: that women should avoid unnecessary annoyance to men. They will immediately change it to: "Men should avoid irritating women." And they will be ready to preach a whole sermon on the ways in which men do irritate women.

Even if they don't do that, they won't take a dispassionate general view of the subject. Each woman will think of herself and her own men-folks. She has seen hundreds of women. But she won't try to look at her sex as a whole. She will instantly be on the defensive about herself.

Every man knows that he can't make a general remark about women, to a woman, without getting a personal comeback of some sort. If there are exceptions, they are so rare that they only emphasize the rule.

Let's take an example outside the domestic field. Suppose a woman asks a business man whether girls are satisfactory as office employees. And suppose the man, in answering, says that girls are supersensitive.

"You can give a man a calling-down," he may say; "but if you criticize a girl's work, her feelings are pretty sure to be hurt. They're rather difficult in that way."

Immediately the woman begins to think about herself; and nine times out of ten she manages to pivot the conversation around to the subject of whether she is sensitive or not.

Or take even the weather. You can't discuss it as a broadly interesting topic with a woman. She keeps bringing it back to the way the weather affects her, or her family, or her plans. It is the same with health. She is interested in the subject only as it concerns her individually.

As for religion, love, marriage—anything which deals with emotions—she can't talk of these things in the abstract. Back of all her opinions there is some personal bias.

One man said to me: "What I can't understand about women is that they 'think' with their emotions and not with their minds."

Things I Can't Understand About Men

Drawings by Norman Price

WE WOMEN, I think, are more tolerant toward men than men are toward us. Not that we deserve much credit for it. By nature and by training, men are impelled to get what they want. We women have the same natural impulse; but in most cases all our training is toward a more or less patient acceptance of what is handed out to us.

Patience is a good teacher of philosophy; and philosophy encourages tolerance. So, although we may emit some sparks of irritation over masculine ways, I don't think there is any real fire of resentment.

"Oh, well," we say; "men are like that! I suppose they can't help it."

Nevertheless, we do allow their peculiarities to strike these little sparks of irritation. Quite as often as men say that they can't understand us, we say that we can't understand them. The only difference is that we are more likely to say it with a tolerant smile.

I had a demonstration of this the other afternoon. Eight of us, all women, had been playing bridge; and afterward, as we were having "refreshments," I brought up the subject of the things men do which women say they can't understand.

There was no lack of response, either in volume or in variety. But what especially interested me was the tone of the conversation. Most of our complaints were made humorously and were received with smiles of mutual understanding. We weren't bitter. We were amused! Only toward a few masculine traits was there a feeling of serious and puzzled resentment. Let's take these few first and get through with them.

I found that I had "started something" when I said: "Well, here is one thing that seems strange to me: After a woman is married to a man, he is irritated by the very traits and mannerisms which he liked in her before they were married.

"For instance, I have known a dozen cases of men falling in love with girls who had no more brains than you could put into a teacup; the helpless, clinging, irresponsible kind; the kind that knows everything about flirtation, but not enough about finance to be sure that two and two make four; the kind that is always asking a man to tell her what to do, and who really hasn't sense enough to decide without being told.

"And the man simply adores it! Her helplessness makes him want to cherish and protect her. Her ignorance of practical affairs seems charmingly feminine. When she wants him to decide every question for her, he glories in his sense of masterfulness. He loves her clinging dependence.

"THESE are the traits which captivate him. But after he is married to her, he soon begins trying to make her all over—with these very traits eliminated! In most cases, he accomplishes nothing, except to make them both miserable.

"He knew she wasn't practical. Yet he is constantly irritated because she is an incompetent housekeeper and has only a child's grasp of money matters. He gets sick and tired of having to tell her what to do. He demands disgustedly whether she hasn't any mind of her own. He is indignant if she is flirtatious—the only thing she knows how to be—with other men.

"From my point of view, he ought to feel this way toward that type of girl. But he ought not to wait until after he had married her! Especially when he has married her because he loved these very qualities. I can't see why he shows so little intelligence."

"No," said one of the group; "and yet we know that men are almost always curiously *un*intelligent in regard to women. And inconsistent! One of my friends back home, for instance, married a gay chatterbox of a girl, the sort that talks and laughs most of the time without saying much of anything. Nevertheless, she was awfully nice; and nobody's fool either.

"I often saw them during their engagement. He used to joke her about talking so much, but he was perfectly good-humored about it and I think he really enjoyed her nonsense. We all did. But when I saw them last summer, he was openly irritated by it. He would make cutting remarks about 'a woman's tongue.' Once, I remember, he broke out with: 'For heaven's sake! why can't you give someone else a chance to get in a word now and then!'

"The point is, he knew before they were married that she was a born talker. He apparently liked it. At any rate, it didn't annoy him. I can't understand his inconsistency in being furious because she continued to be the very same sort of person he had fallen in love with."

"We can't understand it," said another woman, "but I guess all men are alike in that respect. Before a girl is married, she has various little ways which a man merely laughs at.

"'You're a funny kid!' he says.

"But when she is his wife, with identically the same little ways, he says: 'Why the devil do you do such fool things!'"

"Well," spoke up one woman, "since we are on this subject, here's another thing which I can't (Continued on page 138)

"... Hating people is like burning down your own house to get rid of a rat."

THE Wages Of HATE

By Harry Emerson Fosdick

SHE came into my "confessional" as respectable a person in appearance as you could find at church on Sunday. Before she had been talking five minutes, however, I knew that I had on my hands another case of hate. She hated her sister. Her sister did not know it. Nobody knew it. Not by deed or word had her hatred ever found utterance. She lived in the same house with the one whom she hated, in a dutiful and affectionate relationship, but, like a smoldering fire well banked from above, her repressed animosity had for years licked its fiery way among the basic emotions of her life, and left her a miserable, incinerated soul.

In this case the story was easy to get at. Long years before, a love affair, that in the opinion of all the family had promised no happiness and much ill-fortune, had been balked, largely through the intervention of this sister. It was the only real love affair my confidante had ever had. She acknowledged the fine motives of the family, the loyal intentions of the sister, and the probable wisdom of her action; but, for all that, hatred had set in. She had fed its flames unconsciously at first because its heat was a substitute, poor but welcome, for the warmth which love had previously lent her life. Then her secret enmity, being well started, had taken things into its own control. Outwardly decent and kindly, performing her daily duties with attention and fidelity, saying the words and doing the deeds that sisterly affection would naturally suggest, she was nevertheless burning herself out with hate.

She came to me because at last she saw that unless she could displace her animosity by good will she would be literally a ruined personality.

That case is far from unfamiliar—so much so that I dread publishing this article because I know how many letters will pour in from people with similar experiences, never before confessed to any son of man. And, as the case is familiar, so the lesson of it is obvious. We commonly think of hatred as being dangerous to the person against whom it is directed. Of course, that easily may prove to be the case. But the first and basic truth to be seen concerning hatred is that it is disastrous to the person who harbors it. Keep a tiger in the house and you may succeed in living with it; but try keeping hatred in the heart and no power on earth can prevent catastrophe.

The fact that accumulated animosity, like stored dynamite, may at any moment explode and damage the hated person is clear. Only the other day a man who long had harbored a grudge, had brooded vindictively over his supposed wrongs, and so had accumulated hatred, suddenly and unexpectedly exploded, after which, coming to, he discovered that he had picked up a handy and unpremeditated weapon and, like Cain of old, had killed his brother. Hatred obviously is a dangerous commodity for the public. Even a caravan of dynamite through the streets must bear a red flag of warning, and dynamite is safer than hate.

WHAT most of us need to learn, however, is the neglected truth that the primary victim of cherished hate is not the one against whom the hate is directed, but the one who does the hating.

Here, for example, is a man who already had had a bitter and disillusioning experience in marriage, and who at last found happiness and peace in a newly

What's the Date of Your Mind?

"WHEN you hear a man say 'I hate,' adding the name of some race, nation, religion, or social class, you are dealing with a belated mind," says Doctor Fosdick. "That man may dress like a modern, ride in an automobile, listen over the radio, but his mind is properly dated about 1,000 B. C.

"Nowhere is such group-hatred so wretched in its effects as in religion. Religion should be the supreme unifying force on earth, but hatred can transform it into one of the most divisive forces. An English schoolchild is said to have written this in an essay:

"'There used to be wild animals in England, but because of Christianity there are few of them left; those that are left are to be found in the theological gardens.'

"To put the matter positively, there is nothing more needed in this world than good will. Somehow or other, these nations, races, creeds, and colors must live together. Science has spoken an infallible word about that. We must somehow manage to live together, and there is only one way in which we can live together—with good will. And there is only one thing that ever yet created good will, and that is good will. Somebody must start it. Somebody must generously pour good will into this situation."

DR. HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK, minister at the Park Avenue Baptist Church, New York City, is one of the most distinguished and popular preachers of modern time. His books, among them "The Manhood of the Master," "The Assurance of Immortality," "The Meaning of Prayer," "The Meaning of Faith," and "The Meaning of Service," have been widely read. His church is packed to the doors every Sunday and there is an overflow crowd in the basement served by amplifiers. His sermons are also broadcast by radio. Doctor Fosdick was born in Buffalo, New York, fifty years ago. In addition to his preaching and his writing he is Professor of Practical Theology at Union Theological Seminary.

WILLIAM WALLACE ATTERBURY is president of the Pennsylvania Railroad, with its 180,000 employes. He began work with the Pennsylvania as an apprentice in the Altoona shops. During the World War he served as a Brigadier General, in charge of rail transportation with the American Expeditionary Force in France. In the course of his extraordinary career General Atterbury has accumulated a store of knowledge about the kind of men who rise, and the chances a man now has for promotion. That's why THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE asked him to give the accompanying interview.

Do Young Men Have The Chances Their Fathers Had?

In this article the president of the biggest railway system in America answers that question for you

By William S. Dutton

DID the young man of thirty or forty years ago have an easier time of it getting ahead in business than has the young man in this year of 1928?

"He did!" declares the modern youth with no uncertain emphasis and conviction.

"He did not! He had a harder time!" is the retort, equally emphatic, of the older man who has arrived.

A young Southerner, taking pen in hand, recently expressed the view of untold thousands of young men in a typical letter to the Editor of this magazine. He wrote:

"We younger fellows admire the successful men of the older generation and enjoy their stories of 'how they did it;' but could they do it again in the face of present-day odds? A few, yes. A greater number, no! The most of them wouldn't reach first base, starting out with the equipment they orginally had in dollars and ideas, if they had to begin over again today.

"Plain good luck," this writer went on, was the deciding factor in the success of many of our leaders in business: they had chanced to be on the right spot at the right time. Others merely had "struck it rich" in the opening and exploitation of new parts of the country. Still others had caught onto the flying coat tails of an unparalleled industrial development and been whirled by it on to fame and fortune with only ordinary effort on their parts.

"These men possessed splendid judgment and gave careful attention to money," he concluded, "but where would they be in the rush of today with their elementary-school educations and one-dollar capitals? A great many wouldn't be able to land a decent job!"

And in the same mail, from the president of a Western business house, came this letter:

"The trouble with our young men of today is that they are not willing to start in at the bottom and work for advancement. They want to make an overnight success, a 'killing.' They judge the value of a job by the amount of salary paid, not by its opportunities. They have double the opportunities for advancement, if they do work, that we of the older generation had as boys. Tell them that, however, and they laugh at you."

Which of these views is right?

I went for the answer to this question to W. W. Atterbury, being guided to him by three reasons:

First, General Atterbury is one of the most outstanding of those leaders who started their careers forty-odd years ago, in his case as an apprentice in the Altoona shops of the Pennsylvania Railroad, of which great system he now is president. His rise, undisputedly, has been one of ability and performance in keen competition. A graduate of Yale, his equipment at the outset was such as would command respect in any employment office today, a fact in this case which gives him a neutral position.

Second, as a railroad executive—not only in this country but also in France during the war, where he directed the building and operation of American military lines—he has been in contact with all of the principal phases of business, industry, and finance.

Third, few men have greater responsibility in connection with the hiring and promotion of men than has General Atterbury: the railroad which he heads is one of the three largest employers of men in America, having more than 180,000 on its rolls.

And when I submitted the question to General Atterbury he gave me a surprising answer. He said that both of the expressed views are right—as far as they go.

THE view of the young man is right, first, because the greater competition in modern business has raised its standards, with a consequent greater demand upon the ability of the beginner; second, because business today demands more preparation by the beginner who hopes to master it; and, third, because the production of industry per man is greater than ever before in the world's history.

Yet the view of the older man likewise is right and for an equal number of general reasons: first, because the introduction of these higher standards, forced by competition, has made it more difficult than ever for men to hold their jobs by reason of seniority alone, thus opening the way to younger men to replace them; second, because the new science in business management has kept wages up and prices down, thus releasing a new buying power that has created a necessity for an unprecedented business development; and, third, because there actually has been a greater proportionate increase in executive jobs than there has been in population—and this at a time when the whole spirit of business favors youth in mind and in body.

"We are demanding more of the modern young man," explained General Atterbury; "but the conditions which make this demand imperative extend upward through the whole business structure to include those older men who were trained and grew up under vastly different conditions. Every man or woman who is earning a living is affected, regardless of age, residence, or vocation. Every one of us is being judged by new standards that are intensely more exacting than were those of thirty or forty years ago—yes, even of a dozen years ago. No doubt you have seen and felt this in your own work.

"AND yet, paradoxically, it is in this change and due to these new standards that the greater opportunity of the young man arises. By the very nature of things today, men who are in posts of leadership must actually lead and produce. Favoritism, pull, past records, and gray hairs can't hold them in their positions for long if their job has outgrown them. Business no longer dare tolerate incompetence or even what is just 'ordinary' performance out of sentiment. If the old executive has gone stale, he must make way for a new one. It is the day of the rising man in business, and he usually is a young one.

"One of my associates recently visited the office of a friend in another business. He had not been there for a number of years. To his surprise he found most of the former executives gone. New, young faces were at desks. Equipment was new and of the most improved type. The whole office had undergone a change.

"'What's happened?' he asked. 'Where is the old force?'

"'Pensioned, some of 'em,' was the answer. 'Others, just let out. We aren't monopolizing our field any more, you know. Two live competitors are fighting for our business, and I woke up one day to find they were getting more of it than was healthy for us. The result is that we're fighting a little ourselves now.'

"And the friend went on to explain that the former executives had not been 'let out' because they weren't good executives, but because they were not good enough! He had discovered right in his own offices, once he had started to look, younger men who could do better work. And he had had no choice. Competition had forced him to promote the better men!

"The same thing, in effect, has been happening in every line of business. It is similar to what occurred when the army went to France to face war conditions. One of the first things the war did to the army was to (Continued on page 120)

The Shiner-Up

Who put a glow on everything she touched, including a couple of lives

By Agnes Sligh Turnbull — Illustrated by Thomas Fogarty

DR. HARRISON WESTLAKE wrung out a weary-looking tea towel and flung it over the rack above the sink, emptied the dishpan with a gesture of utter disgust, and then pulled down his sleeves. As he did so he noticed that his right cuff bore a decided irregularity of outline.

He studied it for a moment, and then, retrieving a pair of scissors from a kitchen drawer, he painstakingly trimmed off the ragged edge. It made a little improvement, but not much. The material had broken quite through. The doctor made a small grimace. He was thinking of the dozens of shirts which in the old days he had carelessly thrown away at the first sign of wear. And he wondered what men on meager incomes did with a perfectly good shirt which had one impossible cuff!

"There must be secrets of the masses which I have not yet learned," he said to himself with a dry smile.

He went along the hall and up the stairs to Harriet's room. His sister looked her full ten years older that morning. She lay very tired and white against the pillows, her small delicately veined hands clutching each other nervously on the counterpane.

"All right, Hat?" the doctor queried.

The young woman on the bed smiled gamely.

"Just fine! Really, Harrison, it's ridiculous of you not to let me get up. How could housework hurt me? Everybody says it's the finest exercise. I'm just clumsy about it yet; but I'll be a marvelous manager soon. I'm simply going to get up today. . . ."

The doctor shook a solemn finger.

"Do you think for a minute I'm going to let you deprive me of my one patient? Not on your life! The very act of taking your temperature night and morning keeps up my morale!"

They laughed together, and then Harriet caught his arm nervously.

"Harrison, wasn't that . . . the telephone?"

Her brother made a great show of severity:

"Now, Hat, you simply must not act as if the ringing of the telephone was an unprecedented happening. It's just not done that way in doctors' households. You should say, 'Heavens, will that bell never stop ringing!' . . . Say, that is the 'phone all right. . . . I thought it was the kids' bicycles on the street. . . . I'll—"

The doctor's long legs took the stairs two at a time. He rushed into the office, sat down at the desk, paused a second to catch his breath, then reached for the 'phone and said in a deep, grave voice:

"Doctor Westlake speaking."

A faint far-away sound came over the wire, and then:

"Oh," said a small voice. "Is it your family that has advertised for a companion-helper, refined housework for elderly couple?"

"It is not," said the doctor shortly.

"Oh," said the voice, "these telephone calls are always the wrong thing, aren't they?"

"Yes, I've noticed that myself." His tone was grim.

The person at the other end of the wire seemed to be considering.

"You—you wouldn't happen to need anyone for housework?"

It caught the doctor off guard.

"I never needed anything so badly in my life! . . . except an epidemic," he added under his breath.

"Well, then, would you try me? I could come right up." She named her price per week.

The doctor looked around. He was as near to despair on that morning as he had ever been in his life. The house was dirty. The kitchen yawned soiled dishes at him each time he entered it. He was hungry himself for a good dinner, and Harriet needed dainties he couldn't for the life of him prepare in spite of his best efforts.

On the other hand, his bank balance was at a perilously low figure. If the luck didn't break soon he would have to go out and dig ditches, or get a job driving a truck. It was certainly no time to take on the extravagance of a maid.

"I could come for a week on trial," the voice suggested.

Something sane and cautious in the doctor's disposition became suddenly volatile and flew away.

"Can you cook?" he demanded.

"Oh, yes!"

"Then," the doctor tried to hold his tone at its grave, professional note, "I believe you may come for the week at least. My sister is ill and we do need some assistance. Our address is 36 Pine Street, Riverview."

"I'll be right out!" said the voice.

He hung up the receiver and went slowly back to Harriet.

"Who was it?" Harriet asked quickly as he appeared in the doorway.

"My dear," he said, "try to keep your pulse and temperature normal but . . . I've just engaged a maid!"

"A—what?"

"A maid. A companion-helper. A refined house worker. A cook. Now, lie still. I'll tell you just how it happened."

In spite of her aghast look as he began, the doctor saw the involuntary expression of relief creep into her eyes as he finished. It stabbed him. Poor old Hat! It had all been so terribly rough on her.

The experience of waking up one morning to find herself practically penniless instead of rich, with no one in the world to lean upon but a young medico brother just out of his interneship was a pretty rocky one! She had been so sporting about it too. Had tried up to the very limit of her slender strength to do her part; had battled bravely with the housework which she had never before done in her life, and kept a fine show of spirits in the face of all the discouragement.

"So that's the refined house worker!" ejaculated the doctor to himself, as he stepped from his car

The doctor set his teeth together hard as he went down stairs again to prepare for the round of his two precious, only calls.

"This thing's just got to break!" he ground out to himself. "And, by the Lord Harry, it's got to break soon!"

He went to the garage and started the car. The noisy jars and creakings of the second-hand machine were always in the nature of torture to him as he remembered the sleek, shining, noiseless creature of speed that used to be his. But it had gone along with the rest of their valuable possessions to clear up the debts that overwhelmed them at their father's death, a year ago. Debts he and Harriet had never even suspected. The only bit of relief in the whole sad business was that their mother had not lived to see the wrecking of the old home.

The car wheezed and snuffled as he backed it out the drive. It slipped a little under the brake as he turned and almost struck a handsome roadster that was passing. Harrison Westlake felt his blood grow hotter within him. That car belonged to Doctor Wood, who lived in the large brick house up the street, where lines of waiting cars were parked during his office hours. Everything about him and his home shouted success.

Harrison looked despondently at his own house. It was the best he could afford to rent for his purpose, a sprawling shingle cottage with a moderate front lawn enclosed by a low white fence. Harriet had pronounced it quaint, and so it was. But undeniably it had a seedy, rundown, disintegrating appearance. A few spindling evergreens grew under the front windows; without needing paint desperately, the shingles looked faded and drab. The front gate hung crooked.

Even the sign plate bearing the inscription "Harrison Westlake, M. D.," which he had hung there so proudly six months ago, now looked dull and old.

As he rode on, his black mood grew darker. Everything in the way of bad luck had seemed to hit him at once. He had planned in the first place, with a sort of zealot's fervor, on a year's study abroad before he began to practice—in London

Harriet left him at the table, went into the office and wrote a few lines on his desk pad

"Tell Us About The Game!"

That's the demand of the radio fans, and the announcer who forgets it is sure to be called down, as I have been—But if people didn't express themselves in letters and telegrams to us, we'd never know what they do like and what they do not

RADIO, like all other forces which appeal to a large public, has developed its cranks, and among them, of course, are the queer inventors. One time a chap came to us with one of those things which Don Marquis's famous character, the Old Soak, would call a "deevice." He declared he had perfected a little instrument into which a man might talk in one language and his address would come out at the other end in his own voice, but perfectly translated into another language.

All we had to do was to put one of these little contraptions into the radio circuit and set it for what language we wished, and the invention would do the rest. And, of course, by putting a number of them into the circuit we could have the same speech broadcast at the same time in as many different languages as we desired.

Of course we laughed at him. But the older I get and the more I see of radio and its miracles, the less I am disposed to laugh at anything. If this age of marvels continues I will pretty soon arrive at the stage where I shall believe anything anybody tells me. Only recently, we have been told of a new instrument in radio transmission designed to enable one man to send a message to another without anyone else being able to get it. The sender talks into the microphone. Then some kind of mechanism inside jumbles up the message so that it would sound to anyone tuning in on it like a lot of static. But if you have a receiving set properly adjusted, your set will receive that tangled-up message, unjumble it, and deliver it to your ear in perfect order.

Now all this is said because of one of the problems which we are now facing in radio—the broadcasting of a program which can be heard in various countries, each speaking a different language. It seems only a few years ago that radio was dealing with the problem of getting its programs safely across the tangle of steel structural frames of Manhattan to Long Island. Now, we are talking about getting a program to various continents across the barriers of language. You may remember that when the Apostles received the gift of tongues, it is recorded that they were able to address a multitude of people of different nations, and that all could understand. That, of course, was a miracle. And, while radio works marvels, we have to manage along without miracles. The latest occasion for meeting this problem was the broadcasting of the opening of the great Conference of American Republics at Havana recently.

THE conference was about to open. President Coolidge was to be there to represent the United States. All the republics of South and Central America sent their foremost statesmen to that memorable gathering. The National Broadcasting Company had its representatives there to direct the radio end of the program. I was stationed at the microphone in our studio in New York.

The opening address was to be made by President Machado of Cuba. President Coolidge was slated to reply in English. Our people would be able to understand their own President, but the Cuban executive would be unintelligible to most of them. For the same reason, our Southern neighbors would be able to understand Machado but not Coolidge. Here is the way we handled the situation:

President Machado spoke into the microphone in Havana. His speech was transmitted by telephone wire to two points. It went to Pittsburgh, where there is a powerful short-wave transmitter, and there it was sent out by short-wave—used in distance broadcasting—to all of Spanish America. Thus, Machado's speech from Cuba reached Brazil and the Argentine and all points south by way of Pittsburgh.

The other wire brought the address to New York to the studio of WEAF. As the Cuban President began to speak, his voice was permitted to go on the air from our antennæ to our American listeners for just a few sentences, and then it was faded out and I began to read a carefully made translation of it. A few times during this rendition the speaker's voice from Havana was allowed to drift into the air for a few moments, in order to help listeners to visualize what was taking place. Thus, at the same time, Mr. Machado's speech was going out in Spanish to Spanish America through Pittsburgh, and to North America in English through me.

Afterward people commented on the lucky circumstance that I finished the last syllable of the speech in English at the same instant as the Cuban President ended in Spanish. But this was not a lucky chance. It was (Continued on page 151)

The "cream of society" bowed slightly: "Happy to meet you. I hope we shall be great friends"

High Hattie

She and her girl friend, Geraldine, decide that fathers are simply terrible—All they say is "No, no, no!"

WHAT is eating at Hattie now?"

This coarse quotation fell upon four shocked girlish ears, and Harriette Deale felt that she was making a deep impression upon her guests. She sat upright on the grass, nursed her bare knees and her grievances.

"That's what my own father said to me. That's how he spoke to the only daughter he has—not counting Sylvia. It was enough to make a person's blood boil and run cold."

Nature had been in an economical mood the day Harriette was planned. Now, at thirteen, the child was small of stature, spidery of arms and legs, equipped with toy hands and feet. Her face, framed in straight black hair bobbed at the ear line, was a cameo of a whiteness which had defied the New England suns and winds. Her nose was slightly tilted, both naturally and by notorious habit.

There were only seventy-five pounds of Harriette Deale, and her elder sister had once sunk so low as to hint that this was all the world needed.

The egg-shaped little Tillie Rickhill, rocking on her stomach, stared at the speaker in open-mouthed fascination. No girl in her social circle knew so many queer words as Harriette, or waved her face so entertainingly.

"How does it feel," she asked, "to have your blood boil and run cold?"

The rowdy young lady here went into a series of whoops, snorts, and giggles, and otherwise misconducted herself

With this faint encouragement, the lecturer went over the outrage again, this time with more detail and heightened color effects. This was the performance of one who loved the rolling sound of words and loved to roll her own. She loved words (again to quote the cynical Sylvia) "not wisely but too well!"

"We were all sitting right there on the shadowish veranda last night. Just our own family. For a wonder, there were no weak-minded idiots sitting around and talking to Syl, and a person could call your soul their own and not have my ears simply bursted by this terrible gabble, gabble, gabble!

"So it was all nice and quiet there, and I said: 'Isn't the moon beautiful?' Father looked as though he had just become con—you know—conscientious of my presence. And then he said, 'You moon along to bed, young lady.' Of course old Syl had to snicker and giggle like a gander. I answered, 'Very well, if nobody here has any 'preciation of nature, perhaps I had better.' So I arose up with womanly digilty and went into the house. And that's when Father said those insulting words."

"What's eating at Hattie." Tillie supplied the offensive phrase with unnecessary relish.

"I hate to be called Hattie, anyway," the morose young lady added.

"Thath the way fatherth are." Thus Geraldine McIntyre, the third member of this lawn party. Gerry had a kind heart and sympathetic blue eyes, but her teeth were being straightened. She talked through hardware, and could not make her "s's" behave. "I think fatherth are thimply terrible. All they thay is 'No.' It'th justh, 'No, no, no' all the time, no matter how bad you need it. The other day I—"

"THEY don't understand a young girl's nature," continued Harriette, who had no intention whatever of relinquishing the center of the stage. "They think if you've got something to eat and wear and a place to sleep, that's all a young girl needs. They don't know that a young girl needs—spirtchal food."

"What's that?" asked Tillie—for the subject of eating was ever close to her heart. "A kind of angel cake?"

Harriette ignored this query, and went on:

"Sometimes I wonder what Mother ever saw in him. There is nothing romantic about him at all. He doesn't look romantic or dress romantic or act romantic. Do you know what the grown-ups call him?"

"Tham," said Gerry, her eyes full of sympathy.

"Sam Deale!" Harriette's snub nose was wrinkled in distaste. "Where are any romantics in that?"

"My uncle had the romantics," said helpful Tillie. "It hurt him the worst in his back."

This error had to be removed, and next Gerry put in a claim that her father was no romantic character, either, besides being stingy in money matters; and it was some time before Harriette got back to the indictments. When she did, however, she made an utter ruin of her male parent.

A popular song once inquired rhetorically, "What's the matter with Father?" To such a question, Harriette, in today's critical mood, would have replied, "Practically everything!"

Harriette Deale had recently acquired her first teen and she felt her responsibility keenly. Another thing that ailed her was high ideals which she had acquired from literature and the silent drama. She now judged her father by movie and fiction standards, and promptly found him guilty.

Not only was his name "Sam" instead of Warwick, Rutherford, Cuthbert, Sylvester, or Algernon, but also he had been unhappy in his choice of occupation. Instead of being an engineer, a sea captain, a great physician heroically saving lives, an aviator, a cowboy, or an army colonel, he was a fire insurance agent. In all her reading and movie-going she had never met a hero who was in that line of work—nor had the Misses Rickhill and McIntyre.

It was further charged that Mr. Deale was not tall, slim, and handsome, like Jocelyn's father in "Pine Needles," but short and inclined to stoutness. He had no touch of gray around the temples, as worn by the better class of dads; instead, his hair was thin almost to baldness.

He was far from picturesque in his clothing. He did not smoke a pipe like he-man movie fathers, nor innumerable cigarettes, but cheap little cigars out of a paper box. He drove his sedan carefully, and not with that splendid devil-may-care recklessness such as Cuthbert Cunningham had shown in "Altar Fires" with his rakish French roadster.

Many other things were wrong with Daddy. He did not act as if weighed down by some secret sorrow gnawing at his vitals, like Gwendolyn's father in "Blazing Youth." Nor was he a victim of drink, like Mr. Rutherford Brangwynne, who was saved by a daughter's love in the last chapter.

He did not totter on the edge of exposure and financial ruin, like many fathers of song and story, but seemed to be getting along pretty well. He was no magnificent gambler ready to stake everything on the turn of a card. If he lost one dollar and forty-three cents at bridge, he thought that was too bad. He did not dance, either—that is, not what the modern world calls dancing.

A SOFT summer breeze blew over the spacious lawn of the Deale home, bringing with it the hot smell of freshly mowed grass. Harriette's audience sat spellbound by the tale of her bitter wrongs, Tillie's round face full of curiosity; Gerry, starry-eyed with sympathetic understanding. Like the expert dramatist she was, Harriette had saved her most serious charge for the last: "My father doesn't know how to treat a young girl. A father should be a pal to his daughter, and not just sit and look at his paper and just kind of grunt when a person speaks to them."

Gerry knew how that was, because her father, also, grunted, especially when asked for money.

"The Earl of Nutting was a fine father in 'Seven Oaks.' He and his daughter, the Honorable Margaret, were prackly nothing but pals. The Earl of Nutting listened respectively when his daughter talked, instead of making coarse jokes. He lavished her with all the heart could wish for, and let her stay up late and everything. The Earl of Nutting was always pally and comradish."

"Comradish," said Tillie. "What kind of a radish is that?"

But, instead of answering Tillie's question, Gerry leaned forward and asked in a confidential tone:

"What are you going to do, Harriette? A perthon can't get a divorth from their papa."

The gloomy young thing shook her bobbed head hopelessly:

"He's not the kind of father I'm going to pick for my children."

"How doth your mother bear up under it?"

"Mother is splendid. You'd never know anything was wrong. She wears a mask of gayety over her aching heart."

Gerry looked toward the veranda, where a white-clad young lady could be observed taking her ease in a willow chair.

"How about your thister?"

"Don't talk to me about Sylvia!"

Tillie's eyes widened again.

"Is they something the matter with her too?"

"I could be good pals with my father if it wasn't for Syl. She is always coming between us. She makes me sick!"

Tillie gazed at the porch, as one making a scientific experiment.

"She don't make me sick. I feel pretty good."

"You don't have to live with her, and I do."

"Anyway, she ith a pretty girl," said Gerry.

Harriette elevated her nose one degree.

"Some think so, perhaps. She does, anyway."

"You ought to be ashamed of yourself, wishing you didn't have any sister," said Tillie Rickhill. "Something awful might happen to her."

"When you get to be as old as I am, you'll reelize—when you—when— Well, for goodness' sake who is that? I never saw him before in all my life!"

THE three fresh young faces turned toward the street. Here, indeed, was something rare and exotic—no product of pastoral Pequot this—no home-brew. This was a metropolitan, one not afraid of color. His turned-down Panama hat bore a startling band, his necktie was a spectrum, his light sweater, not obscured by a coat, was covered with cunning figures of violent hues. He was a perambulating lily of the field, a free street-parade, a grand display of fireworks.

The board of estimate gave the gaudy stranger careful attention. He was not unaware of this scrutiny, and looked into the Deale estate with interest. A grim realist might have said that his glance was directed not at the three little girls on the lawn but over and beyond them to the scenic occupant of the porch, who seemed to be absorbed in her book, but was not.

Not by the faintest flicker did "High Hattie" indicate that anybody had spoken to her. She had that great gift

As this parade passed its given point, Harriette was thoroughly bedazzled. She took in every detail—his glittering garments, his commendable altitude and satisfying slimness, his firm step, the correct current flare of his trousers. She gazed after him, looked wistfully at the place where he disappeared behind the Jameson hedge, as if it were the last spot at which he had been seen alive.

"My, what a distingrished-looking gentleman!" she exclaimed.

"Who, him?" asked Tillie Rickhill. One felt that she did not share this view.

"I know who he ith," said Gerry proudly. "He'th thtaying at Mith Gregory'th boarding-houth near uth."

"What is his name?" asked Harriette.

It was an unfortunate name, considering Gerry's defect of speech.

"Hith name ith Fothter Thatterlee."

"Foster Satterlee." Harriette translated into English. "Why, I think that's a perfectly noble name!" At this point, she heaved her bosom. She did this with a screen heroine's thoroughness; in fact, she heaved almost her entire system.

"Satterlee, Satterlee, Satterlee!" Tillie Rickhill rattled. "It sounds like a day of the week—Satterlee, Sunday, Mon—"

"Oh, my goodness! Can't you shut up?" At times of irritation Harriette talked less like the classics and more like a member of the human race.

"That man is my—" Harriette, aware of the scoffing eyes of little Tillie, resorted to the parental trick of spelling: "He is my i-d-e-e-l."

She went into a state of suspended animation and came out of it with this thought: "Now, if a person only had that kind of a person for a father! A person could be pals with a person like that."

"Oh, slush! He's too young for a father." A whimsy came to Tillie Rickhill and shook her with mirth. "If he was your papa he'd be Sylvia's papa, too. He isn't much older than she is." The rowdy young lady here went into a series of whoops, snorts, and giggles, and otherwise misconducted herself.

Harriette felt that there was one person too many here. Tillie was clearly not the kind of girl to share one's aspirations.

"I feel kind of hungry," Harriette said unexpectedly. "I hope it is getting to be lunch time."

Tillie felt the contagious pangs of hunger. Her tastes were by way of being primitive; her thoughts ran to collations and refreshments, snacks and tidbits, not to mention square meals. Harriette provocatively mentioned various delicacies she craved, and presently her unwelcome guest gave up the hopeless struggle and went home.

MISS McINTYRE tarried however, and Harriette felt that she was a soul who could understand. Gerry's defects were dental, not mental. So Harriette reverted to the subject-before-last.

"Yes, he is one of nature's noblemen." A helpful phrase came to her in this crisis. "He is the cream of society."

Gerry had it on high authority that the attractive stranger was a New Yorker and would spend the summer in Pequot.

"I wonder if there is any—Mrs. Foster Satterlee."

"No. Mith Gregory told my mother he'th a bachelor."

This was splendid news. Harriette was looking only for a father, being pretty well suited on the maternal side, and craving no brothers, and (above all things) no sisters.

"I'm going to have him for my dream-father. He is the ideal of my dreams. Such éclair!"

Here she went into one of her trances, and Gerry McIntyre soon found the silence irksome.

"I mutht be going home," she said. "I had a lovely time."

"Don't tell anybody about—you know—I and Foster."

"No, I won't, Harriette. It'th our thecret."

Harriette sped the parting to the sidewalk, and her last words were, "My feelings toward him are purely daughtery."

As she turned toward the house her eye fell upon the pansy beds which bordered the private walk. She studied this little garden with a fresh and thoughtful eye. It was disgracefully weedy and grassy and the blossoms needed picking. Here was work for an ardent flower lover, such as she was—or was about to be. No fence separated the Deale yard from the street. A girl gardener could easily see, and be seen by, any cream of society which might be passing on its way back to Miss Gregory's boarding-house. Harriette's head was in the clouds, but her little feet were on solid ground. She was a practical idealist.

While working upon her flowers, she also worked upon her story. Harriette Stanford Deale, of Pequot, was a maker of fiction—a composer but not a writer. Her flights of fancy were not hedged in by ink and paper. Her plots and visions were achieved without the pangs of penmanship, the stings of spelling, or the griefs of grammar. In this imaginative work she was the permanent heroine.

The hero, however, was constantly taking on new aspects from current events. On this day in late June he was a synthetic product with the best features of Valentino, the Prince of Wales, Gene Tunney, Bobby Jones, and Captain Lindbergh. Now, this composite photograph was further beautified by the addition of her make-believe father, Foster Satterlee.

In her day-dream here among the pansies, she pictured them doing all manner of pally and comradish things. As soon as she knew him well enough, she would call him by his first name, as Beatrice did her father in "Purple Towers." That was a splendid thing for a girl to do, unless her father's name was Sam. She and Foster, then, would take long tramps together and ride in his costly motor car. They would go to plays and dine in costly restaurants. This sort of thing would go on right down through the years.

"On down through the flowing years," she said, "like a great river of time." With pardonable pride she repeated this happy phrase. She must remember to tell it to Gerry McIntyre. "On down through the flowing years, like a great river of time."

NOW suddenly she was aware of the approach of important feet clad in sportive summer shoes. She felt the color mounting to her cheeks. It was indeed he, in all his blond beauty.

Nature's nobleman glanced, not unaffably, in her direction, but did not speak. Of course he did not know that this child and he were about to take a lifelong ride down the great river of time.

"Pardon me, sir"—Harriette was startled to hear herself speak—"would you be kindly enough to tell me what time it is?"

The handsome stranger took off his chromatic hat. No Pequoter would have done that, only social cream.

"It is twenty-two minutes after twelve." His voice was musical.

"Oh, my goodness! Is it as late as that?"

"I'm sorry," said Foster Satterlee. For the first time she noticed that he wore a small but distinguished mustache.

"It's not your fault, sir. Would you"—she achieved an elegant gesture—"would you crave for a few pansies?"

"That's just what I'd crave (Continued on page 179)

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph P. Kennedy and seven of their eight children. Mr. Kennedy, whose unusual story is told in this article, is president of Film Booking Offices, a concern that supplies the world market with about one tenth of its motion pictures

Joe Kennedy Has Never Liked Any Job He's Tackled

But he learned to like each one so well that he hated to give it up when time for promotion came. He has been "lecturer" on a rubberneck wagon, bank examiner, bank president, shipyard executive, and now, while still in his thirties, he is head of a big motion picture firm

By John B. Kennedy

TRADITIONALLY, the picture of a bank president being approached for a commercial loan is a study of warm eagerness meeting an icy stare. But when the head of a certain New England motion picture concern called to solicit financial accommodation from the Columbian Trust Company of Boston, he found the president of the bank an athletically built young man, with coppery red hair, and eyes a shy, boyish blue. Encouraged by the young executive's sympathetic attention, the picture man raced through his story. The market for his wares was such and such; his company had this record of successful manufacture and that prospect of extending sales if they could borrow enough money to tide them over an ambitious production that would enable them to compete with the bigger fellows in their field.

Concluding with an impressive syllabus of costs, film rentals, and probable profits, he waited for the other's reply.

"Well," said Joseph P. Kennedy, who was then probably the youngest of America's big bank presidents, "you make out a good case; but I can't grant the loan. Our bank is too conservative to enter anything so hazardous as the motion picture business."

"Hazardous?" The picture man was flustered. "It's one of the country's largest industries."

"Your company has been in business twelve years," said Kennedy. "Your statistics show you have done a sizable business. Yet you are here seeking a comparatively small loan."

He paused to leave the implication in the picture man's lap.

"I gather"—the picture man's tone was injured—"you don't think much of our management."

"Frankly," said Kennedy, "I don't."

"Well," the picture man retorted, "put in this money and see if you can run the business any better."

For a moment Kennedy paused—he has the habit of pausing before making a final decision. Then he said:

"I don't like the business."

A strange utterance in view of the fact that six years later, if the disappointed motion picture man had gone to see Joseph P. Kennedy, he would have been shown into the headquarters of Film Booking Offices in New York, and there met the president of a concern that supplies the world market with about one tenth of its motion pictures.

"It's the same with every job I've tackled," explained Joe Kennedy, who is now a millionaire with three years to go for forty. "I never liked what I had to do until I did it; then it became my career.

"Not that I'm intimidated by a new job," he added, and square, golf-developed shoulders under his erect red head with its steady blue gaze attested a make-up of physical and moral courage. "I just don't like new jobs, principally because they're new. Yet my progress has been marked by radical changes in employment. I've always hesitated about making a switch because I've liked the old better than the new. And it's always ended by my liking the new better than the old."

THIS distaste for change, which would have handicapped Kennedy's steady upward march had it been a principle of character instead of a mere disposition, is comprised of affection for familiar work and diffidence in face of new tasks. The combination is shared by many men of ability, to their handicap, unless they have the energized sporting instinct to take a chance on making a change.

Joe Kennedy's public life began in sport, on a baseball diamond. He had gone to Harvard, the son of State Senator Patrick Kennedy, of Boston. Young Joe was six feet one inch of raw stamina, working as clerk in a candy store to help pay for his education. Although his father was powerful as local politicians go, he was also poor.

Pooch Donovan, Harvard's redoubtable coach, saw Joe in practice with the freshman art class on the diamond, and the sight gave him joy. Here was a youth with elastic reach, a long, rapid stride, and a zest for the game. He made a first basemen out of Joe, although Joe rather fancied himself as a pitcher. Joe could cover ground fast as a fielder, scooping grounders, stopping line drives and handling infield and outfield throws with precision. But when he came to his sophomore year and contested for a place in the regular line-up there was something lacking. He could hit .300 any day, Pooch Donovan argued with him, if he could get on base fast enough. Donovan figured that Kennedy didn't like his job at first base and Kennedy agreed. Whereupon Donovan declared that first base was the only spot Kennedy could fill on the varsity team.

"And to fill it," he added, "you'll learn how to pour out that six feet of yours in a slide."

After general practice, when the field was cleared Donovan came on the diamond carrying a roped bath towel. He stood at the coaching box by first base and ordered Joe Kennedy to bunt and run. Kennedy cracked the ball and sped like a red streak down the first base line. Then Donovan stepped from the coacher's box and whipped at his legs as he passed. Down went the red head, ducking the towel, sliding feet first into the bag. The process was repeated until Kennedy could slide into base without being touched by the lashing towel.

"That's enough," said Donovan. "You're number one in the batting order from now on."

Which was a source of pride, not only to Joe Kennedy, but to a certain young woman who was promptly informed of his promotion. She was Rose Fitzgerald, daughter of His Honor John F. Fitzgerald, Mayor of Boston, the famed "Honey Fitz." And now—which is telescoping a large and lovely domestic story—the mother of eight young Kennedys.

GRADUATING from Harvard with an A. B. degree and a baseball "H" which, at the time, he treasured even more, Joe Kennedy had only juvenile experience as a candy-store clerk as a background for wage earning. And that had its drawbacks, for he consumed almost as much candy as he sold. Indeed, his early ambition was to be the proprietor of a chain of candy stores. But a sweet tooth is hardly an asset for that or any business, and young Joe's capital of three hundred dollars was insufficient to pay a respectable rent, let alone stock a store.

"The owner of the candy store wanted me back to work for him, but I wanted to go into business by myself and for myself. Yet there was no (Continued on page 145)

If You Ask Me:

A laugh sometimes costs more than it is worth

SMITH worked in the same office with me. (This is a true story, by the way.) He was the funny man of the staff. His sharply amusing sayings were good always for a roar of laughter. In the same office worked a plodding chap, Jones by name. He was the butt of Smith's smartest and most cutting jokes.

Five years later Smith was penniless and out of a job. Jones was a highly successful editor. A lucrative position was vacant in Jones's office. Smith was one of several competent men who applied for it. Smith needed it badly. It went to another applicant. Jones told me about the occurrence, saying:

"Smith was neither better nor worse than the man I gave it to. But—well, I'm only human. I can't forget some of the cruelly funny things Smith said about me in the old days. I don't want him working for me."

Smith had glowed with pride at the howls of laughter he had evoked at Jones's expense. But in his hour of need he paid the bill—as every bill, soon or late, must be paid in one form of coin or another. No fewer than three other of his former laugh victims refused him jobs in later years, to my certain knowledge.

Madame de Staël won world notoriety by her vitriolic repartee, and by her merciless dissection of human failings in curt epigrams. Napoleon Bonaparte, the uncouth young Corsican upstart, was a priceless butt for her gibes. When he rose to power, Madame de Staël was banished and impoverished. A high price for an epigram!

Every big office has its professional wit, who waxes famous for the smart things he says about his fellow workers. As a matter of fact, he is about as smart as if he should throw his pay envelope and his prospects out of the window. He is fiftyfold more foolish than is the office ignoramus. Soon or late he must pay.

It is mighty pleasant to raise a laugh and to tingle to the applause of one's wit. But there is no surer way of rousing the hate of that wit's butt. Often it is costlier to crack a pointed joke than to run over a traffic policeman. For instance, it would be as prudent to slap the average boss in the face as to say some funny thing about him which is almost certain to come back to his ears.

More than one girl has sought to mask her growing interest in a man by making fun of him behind his back. And more than one girl has lost him that way; and with him her brightest chance for future happiness. There are always a host of friends to repeat the stinging pleasantry to him.

In brief, I think the arch-fool of the universe is the man or woman who sacrifices a friend to an epigram, or a business chance for the doubtful joy of saying something cuttingly funny. He or she risks a thousand-dollar bill for the sake of winning a plugged nickel. It is not clever, but the very lowest form of stupidity.

The so-called "smart chap" is never the really "wise guy." He has his reward in the spurious coin of laughter alone. Three times out of four, he has his punishment in a score of bitterly unpleasant and long-lived consequences to his display of wit.

Sunrise

By Archibald Rutledge

A SUNRISE has always been to me not alone a magnificent spectacle of nature, having in it the grandeur of the mighty rhythm of the universe, serene and infallible; but invariably it suggests to me the presence of Him who planned it all. And I feel also, every time the morning comes, a sense of the forgiveness of God for all my shortcomings and downright sins. Sunrise is to me a splendid pledge that God pardons me, and gives me another radiant chance at least three hundred and sixty-five times each year. We who speak of Creation as a wondrous work should give closer heed to the greater marvel of the continuance of the lordly achievement of Creation by the still more astonishing immortality conferred upon it. Whatever Man makes seems ephemeral; what God creates stays created. And every morning we are radiantly reminded by sunrise that "the hand that made us is divine." During the accepted span of a human life, the human heart has the privilege of being humbled and being cleansed through seeing more than twenty-five thousand sunrises.

Perhaps if I tell of certain of the sunrises that have meant most to me, I shall be the more able to convey clearly and adequately how much this daily-recurring splendor has brought into my life. I ought to say that I am not one of those who believe that the marvelous natural mechanism of our solar system is a mere matter of chance, or of the operation of unguided laws. My reason simply cannot leave God out. Granting that the sun does rise in obedience to law, it is a law established by Him "who pillared the blue firmament with light."

I recall a rather memorable experience with a sunrise that I had in the company of a plantation negro named Sam Singleton. Aboriginal in thought and feeling, plantation negroes are among the most authentic and interesting of human beings. They may be as yet far from what we proudly call civilization; but to me they seem very close to God. Their religious attitude is as unfeigned as that of children. To them the rain, the wind, the thunder, the stars, sunset, and sunrise are matters of great moment. I have many a treasured recollection of what I have heard negroes say of these unfailingly recurrent waves in the vast sea of nature's mighty symphony.

Sam and I left home at one o'clock one winter morning to paddle down the Santee River in South Carolina to a place appropriately called "Tranquillity," since it is as solitary as being in the heart of a wild delta can make it. Our plan was to drop down ten miles or so with the ebb tide, designing to reach at dawn the lonely hummock in the huge wasteland that stretches mistily between the two sea-reaching arms of the mighty river. We were to spend a few days duck shooting at Tranquillity, and we started at a time which would afford us sport with the morning flight.

Decorations by Franklin Booth

A Southern river at night is a haunting thing, with great stars hanging like spangles in the dark pines and the ancient water oaks fringing the river shores. Wider flows the dim stream as it moves through the last reaches of the immense coastal plain. Baffling to navigate by broad daylight, the Santee at night is mysterious. And the peril of it undoubtedly was heightened by the kind of craft in which we were traveling. A dugout cypress canoe, it had as certain a tendency to roll as had its parent log, utterly lacking that virtue of stability that one relishes in a boat, especially when one is voyaging through the darkness of a huge river that seems to be wandering toward eternity.

BUT the stars that had been shining when we left home were soon obscured by a fog so dense that we could hardly see beyond the bow of our little boat. As we were going with the tide, we felt sure of our general direction, but when once or twice we came near looming shores, neither of us recognized the landscape as familiar. Then for an hour there was no land visible. I knew that we ought to be near our goal. But the waves that began to roll our canoe were suspiciously like sea waves. The roar of the surf that we had heard for a long time now became almost clamorous. Attempts to reach either shore were vain. The fact that the tide had now turned, or was about to turn, confused us still further. The canoe shipped water, gallons of it. The mist blinded us. There was no use blinking the truth, we were in immediate danger. I told Sam mildly that in case the canoe was swamped, we must turn it over and cling to it. How can I ever forget what he said?

"Never mind, Cap'n," that humble boatman told me, "it will be daybreak soon."

What was there in that plight of ours on which we could certainly count? Only one thing there was: the coming of light—daybreak, sunrise! It came in time to save us, though we were really on the brink of the sea when the rosy radiance over the delta disclosed our position to us. Yet it was not alone the coming of sunrise that rescued us; it was Sam's reminding me that it was sure to come, restoring thus my courage. And in all these years that have followed, whenever the shadows seem deepest and most impenetrable, I seem to hear, out of the dim celestial past, the quiet voice of Sam Singleton saying to my doubting and besieged heart, "Never mind, Cap'n, it will be daybreak soon."

AS a personal experience, none of my own ever surpassed in moving power that beautiful and dramatic scene which, though it lies years back in the moonlit land of the past and of memory, is vividly alive to me now. It happened at sunrise, and it was of a sunrise.

One dearer to me than all else in life had, for days, lain helpless, speechless. Consciousness was gone. We knew that the mortal mists were fast gathering; that the irremediable river must soon be crossed. The last morning of our watching was misty; the day emerged so wanly that we hardly knew that it had come. Suddenly the one we loved so dearly sat up in bed, a strange light on her face of a happiness past all our mortal joy. She stretched abroad her arms, crying in the radiant abandon of spiritual certainty, "The Dawn! The beautiful Dawn!"

Those were her dying words—glad, triumphant. And for me they hold the eternal promise of the sunrise. They glow with immortality. In every sense, our mortal dawn that day was anything but beautiful; but she saw the beginning of an immortal day. Believing in a God of infinite love and of infinite power, I find it natural to believe that death is not a disastrous sundown but rather a spiritual sunrise, ushering in the unconjectured splendors of immortality.

I remember a marvelous dawn in Pennsylvania that filled me with a sense of shame. The night preceding had been filled with the tumult of a wintry storm. Snow and sleet had been driven madly against the streaming panes. The house creaked and swayed. Under the eaves the freezing wind hooted, thrusting its icy snout into every crack. As I looked out, I could barely see the dark trees, tossing their wild arms despairingly. I could not sleep for thinking of the quail, smothered by the snow in some fence corner; the deer, shivering in their search for browsing; the hapless grouse, trying to dive perchance beneath some treacherously shifting drift of snow to keep from freezing to death. JOHN GABBERT BOWMAN is a crusader, and the magnificent building above (now under construction) is a result of his crusades. He is chancellor of the University of Pittsburgh, which will have for its home this great Cathedral of Learning. Mr. Bowman set out to erect, in the name and for the purpose of education, a building as fine as any devoted to business. He talked, he wrote, he campaigned for his ideal; he made Pittsburgh see it as he did, and then the people of that city subscribed more than ten million dollars to carry out his plans.

John Bowman's Fifty-Story Dream

By Sherman Gwinn

TODAY, intellectually America is fast asleep! With all our boasted wealth and material advance, we are living educationally in a Dark Age.

But there is a new day coming in America, when schoolboys will find joy that captures and thrills them in discovering and developing their own native capacities, quite as much as in baseball or football; when achievements in nobility and in creative living, in making friends and in holding them, will crowd crime off of the front pages of our newspapers.

When college students, "will talk in dead earnest, yes, sometimes all night, about economics, politics, chemistry, and vastness of space, the limits of time, mathematics, literature, biology, and religion."

When great monuments will be erected to teachers as creators of significant life; when our school and university buildings will be like cathedrals in their dignity and beauty, and wealth will deem itself honored to endow them.

A day when, at last, America, with its mighty resources and dormant brain and soul power, will actually be awake and up, done with intellectual sleep-walking, and a giant in spirit as well as body!

No, I am not reciting an extravagant dream. I am only repainting the bolder outlines of a picture presented to me by an eminent educator, Dr. John G. Bowman, chancellor of the University of Pittsburgh. The new day is even now in its first faint dawning, asserts Doctor Bowman. He adds that it will be to our disgrace in history, if by tomorrow it is not here.

I sought out John Gabbert Bowman because, at this moment, he is outstandingly one of the most virile and dramatic figures in the higher educational field. Born and reared in the Mid-West, he is a crusader unfettered by tradition, a blazer of new trails who boldly has set his back to the past. An idealist, I was told; and yet Pittsburgh, the eminently practical, is said to pay him one of the highest salaries ever paid a university president. Bowman is an idealist who does things like a Roman emperor, unafraid!

It was in 1921 that John Bowman took command at the University of Pittsburgh. Briefly, aside from a brilliant scholastic record at Iowa and Columbia, he had been a boat hand on the Mississippi, a newspaper reporter in Chicago, and then a university teacher of English. For five years he had served as secretary of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching; he had been president of the University of Iowa, and for six years director of the American College of Surgeons. A man of intense enthusiasm and feeling, he had built a reputation for originality, for doing the difficult, and for driving force as an executive. Pittsburgh was in need of such a man in 1921.

The university was 140 years old; it began when Pittsburgh began. But Pittsburgh had a single-track mind and the track was industry. Steel, oil, coal, lumber: these were the track. They offered adventure, daring, and wealth; and so much initiative went into their exploitation that there was not much left for education. The facts are that here was one of the richest industrial districts of the world and a university which, for its enrollment, was one of the most poorly supported in the world.

Education, Bowman told me—the ability to think, to see the parts of a problem, to unify them, to come to a conclusion and to stick—that is the vital thing! And here, with wealth on all sides, in this city of mills and mines and factories and fortunes, the "vital thing" was cracked at its capstone! It was, to Bowman, as if a great masterpiece of art had been relegated to the cellar to make way for an electric fan.

"But in this Pittsburgh did not stand alone," said Doctor Bowman. "On the contrary this attitude reflected a national state of mind, a national failure.

"In literature, a really serious book that sells 100,000 copies is a phenomenon in this nation of 120,000,000 people; but a heavyweight championship fight draws 150,000 in a night, while millions listen in by radio. In our newspapers, a sensational killing is a hundredfold more important than a great discovery in science, a 'movie' star more worthwhile than a college president. Our young folks yawn in classrooms but go wild with enthusiasm over a football game.

"OH, YES, we have believed in education, spent millions for school and college buildings, and enacted laws making it compulsory for every child to attend school. But the laws have not made the child like school, nor have the schools made us an educated and cultured people. We have believed in and taken education like medicine, with a wry face and plenty of water. Only recently have we awakened to the fact that a school-teacher is worth in dollars at least as much as a first-rate mechanic; and that such natural resources as oil and coal and forests are possible of exhaustion.

"In brief, we have become unbalanced. We have grown industrially and materially but have lagged spiritually and intellectually. Football has superseded the classroom, not because there is anything wrong with football but because there is something wrong with the methods of the classroom.

"There are three factors mainly responsible for the tastes, the views, and the moral and intellectual levels of the community. These are the home, the church, and the school. (Continued on page 90)

If Youth Makes a Mess of Life, Nothing Else Matters

"YOUR boy is your great hope; mine is that to me," declares Mr. Bowman. "Children are our one priceless possession. If they are no good, nothing else matters. Business, farming, railroads, steel mills—all are futile if the youth of the nation make a mess of life. And the mere teaching of facts does not prevent the mess. In any real school there is a teacher from whose life some sort of full-hearted character shines into the life of the lad and stays there. Yes, it stirs that lad until he knows how to control his temper, to have courage, to find joy in common things and in the out-of-doors, to play fair, to make friends, and to keep them.

"Dry education! Why, if we are not too dumb to understand, there is power in it to call every mechanic, every railroader, every judge, every farmer, and every janitor to prayer, asking his Maker to give us teachers. Real teachers care nothing for rules, marks, or grades. They merely live gloriously, love their boys and girls, give their lives away to them.

"To find such teachers is the country's greatest business."

Gold Is Where You Find It

A story in which love is pitted against its ancient enemy—pride of heritage

By Harold Titus

ILLUSTRATED BY NORMAN PRICE

THROUGHOUT the interview, Howell sat with those odd lights dancing across his cool blue eyes. His gaze held steadily on the girl's lovely patrician face, which hid by its composure, he knew, many and varied misgivings.

She had finished answering his last question, and came to a crisp, decisive stop.

The man nodded slowly.

"Two university degrees," he said musingly. "That represents a great deal. A course in shorthand and typewriting is something. Experience in closing an estate might help." His head jerked forward a trifle. "But you haven't said that you are the daughter of Rodney Burnham. Why not?"

She replied without hesitation, "Because, in business, I did not suppose it mattered much where one came from."

He laughed, not at her response, but at the flush which swept her sensitive face from the tapered chin to the clean brows above her dark eyes.

"I wasn't bullying!" His rough voice was suddenly gentle. "I've had several from the old families come in here. Except you, they've all begun by telling me who their father was. They put it first. But I guess you're right; in business, origins don't matter."

The girl, watching him in that pause, agreed with him and with herself. Twenty years before, she knew, he had been crying the "Express" on street corners. Perhaps that was where his voice got its roughness. The story had it that he had been goaded to achievement by his feud with a distributor of the papers he sold.

"I'll get your job yet!" the newsboy had shrilled through hot tears, and the other had taunted him. But within two years Howell had as good a place with the "Express" as had his enemy; in another five he was circulation manager; when a dozen were gone he was right-hand man to the chief business executive; and by the time he had turned thirty the title to the property stood in his name.

Men liked to tell that story; some with the vicarious pride which comes with the recital of another's success; some—her kind, mostly—with a sort of well-bred scorn for his beginnings. She had heard an epilogue, too; the boy who had made little Marc Howell cry, now a graying man, was still with the paper, never forgiven, because the publisher never forgot a wrong; but kept on because he was a capable servant.

"Schooling, education, degrees; those items help a lot sometimes," Howell said, after a moment. "I had none."

Janet Burnham experienced a quick revulsion. Men like this boasted of their success and their handicaps; such a parade of ego was coming.

But he only added, "I've missed them . . . frightfully."

His voice dropped for emphasis, and her emotion turned into a queer wonder. A strong man, this, smiling tenderly at his shortcomings.

"Now! So much for your qualifications! Why do you ask for a job?"

"I need to work."

"I suppose so." His mouth twitched a trifle at memory of the Old Fort National crash which took her father down to relative poverty and his grave. "But, then, others have had worse luck."

She wondered if that was a sneer, and pride stirred. She had an impulse to terminate the interview. However, she had taken the plunge; necessity was real; she would carry through.

"ALL right: you need work. Why, then, did you pick on me?"

His look turned the edge of that belligerence which seemed to be characteristic.

The girl considered, and then answered frankly, "Because this was the first opening I heard of that was not in the office of some family friend."

"Good! . . . Good girl."

That, the suggestion of familiarity, stung her, until she concentrated on his eyes. The approval there was honest, a solvent.

"But I can't promise much. As much pay, of course, as you'd get from any other stranger. But how long it'll last I can't tell. The 'Express'—it's an open secret—is in a bad way. If I can hold out another year, then, maybe, there'll be something ahead of you," crisply. "That's the chance you take."

"I am in no position to look very far ahead now," she said, and thought that his expression softened a trifle.

"All right! To-morrow at eight-thirty, then."

He rose in abrupt dismissal, and Janet rose too. She was tall, slender, holding her shoulders squared and chin high; she repressed the sweep of relief that ran through her.

"I shall try to please you, Mr. Howell."

He did not answer, looked at her speculatively:

"Know why I'm hiring you, an inexperienced girl, for my secretary?"

"No; I—" His manner was confusing.

"Because I want to know what you folks are like," he said gravely. "You old families. I think you'll do, as an individual. I could pick up some hard-boiled little stenog' I know would do. I'm taking a small chance with you, though, so that I can do a bit of studying. I've been curious about the old families of this town . . . for a long time!"

Her aristocratic chin was a bit higher; her flush again marked.

"I CAME from yonder, behind the mills—" with a wave of one hand. "I got ahead, somehow; I got a finger hold on some sort of success. And then, after I'd got to be publisher of this paper"—brushing his hair with the hand that had motioned toward the slums of his origin—"I said to myself, 'Marc, you've arrived. You had about five grades in school; but you've come as fast as a lot of these lads whose fathers were respected leaders before you came into the world, the son of a bum. Go take your place with 'em.'"

He wet his lips, and laughed again, oddly. "I was only thirty, then. I thought there was only one measure for success and respectability. I tried to take the place I thought was mine; but your sort of folks wouldn't have me in their clubs, didn't want me in their homes. I was another breed of cats, you see. . . . I got over being hurt. I'm honest in just being curious about your kind, what you have and think and feel, that I've missed. That's why I'd like to have a member of one of the town's first families in my shop a while. . . . Or wouldn't your sort stand for that?"

Again his head gave that fractional inch of forward thrust. The girl did not reply for an instant, and saw those dancing lights return to his eyes. She felt that she would have satisfied some of his curiosity if she followed that recurring impulse, and walked out; and yet her desire to put the man in his place was the stronger.

"What you may know of me," she said coolly, "will depend on your capacity to observe!"

She looked hard at him, and he bowed with a peculiar grace.

"I understand, of course."

"At eight-thirty?"

"Eight-thirty."

And so Janet Burnham, lovely, and daughter of the late Rodney Burnham, whose grandfather had been one of the half-dozen men who turned a village into a town and laid the foundations for an expanding city, found a livelihood working for Marc Howell, because the man who came from behind the mills was curious about the people who lived on the river bluff.

He could have selected no better specimen for observation. For a century, her lineage was of gentle-people; for three generations the name had stood for all that was desirable in the city of her birth. Consternation, of course, reigned among her friends:

"But, my dear! You, Janet Burnham, working in an office!" Agatha McDermott, this, bride of a year.

Janet laughed lightly at the bewilderment on her friend's face.

"But, Agatha, I really want to live."

"Live! Why, a dozen of the boys are crazy about you now! Why—"

"A husband, a home, children: those are items in the goal, of course." She was grave now. "But until one finds the sort of man—the precise sort—from whom one can take the sort of things you are now enjoying, one waits. So far, the precise sort hasn't appeared."

"For heaven's sake, what is it you want in a man, then?"

"I've wondered for a long time."

Ned Du Charme, quiet, sensitive, asked that wistfully:

"I don't know, Neddo."

"Of course, I'm poor."

"Poverty!" she flamed. "You don't think that would make a difference?"

"If it did, you couldn't be blamed. . . . But a girl like you, Janet, wasn't brought into the world to put off finding happiness. You're—you're glorious! What can it be?"

She shook her head.

"My father had it, Ned, whatever it is, a quality that won't be named. It carried him through the crash with his chin up. I fear only a few men have it. Perhaps generations are required to develop it."

Ray Wetherill, leaning over the wheel of his smart roadster as they sat motionless on the river drive, dash light throwing his dark, earnest face into deep shadow:

"I'm rich," he said, not boastfully. "I'm respected. I'm a good son of a good father. . . . Can't these satisfy? These, and loving inordinately?"

"Please, don't!" She dreaded hurting him.

"Besides, I hate to think of you with that roughneck Howell."

"Nonsense! He's interesting; so different from any we have ever known, Ray."

"Yes, different." He eyed her curiously. "Janet, you're not—"

"Don't be silly. He—he almost boasts of coming from behind the mills."

Others came; women, protesting, extravagant in sympathy. Men, friends of her father, offering her work in their offices. The sympathy was only tolerated; the offers of more congenial labor were refused graciously.

IN a way, it might have been easier working in one of the well-ordered offices presided over by a family friend. The "Express" was no tranquil spot. All day long she sat in the little anteroom to Howell's office, and met people, putting off those who could be put off, arranging interviews for others, while behind the closed door the man who had hired her so that he might know her kind, drove himself and his aids to the task of hanging to his moderate success for the year he had specified.

That the necessity for driving was real soon became apparent. She heard, through the door, the angry voice of a paper salesman, making his threats; she observed, on pay days, the business manager's harried face.

How Marc Howell drove men! How men worked for him! She heard him talk to the circulation staff, and he seemed to have the power of a religious exhorter. She was with him when his best reporter, balked and wearied after weeks on a suspected paving graft, came in to quit, and she saw Howell put fire and iron into the wan man. A newsboys' strike impended, and the committee called on Howell, stating in street jargon their complaint.

"No applesauce here!" he began, when they had finished, and the cheapness of it jarred her. "I'm telling you kids straight! The other papers may not need to, but the 'Express' has got to make the raise! The others've got money; we're darn near broke. I know what it is to sell papers; I know what it means to you to have extra pennies tacked on. But it's straight goods, kids, that we've got it to do!" And after a while they went out with shining eyes, those callous, big-little boys!

REVIEWING it, Janet realized that nothing but their own language would have carried Howell's conviction, and she had a memory of him as the committee went out, frowning and muttering that it was a darned tough world!

It was all so strange to the girl, after her serene, sheltered life.

"It'll make enemies of questionable friends," Howell said one day to his managing editor. "But if there's an epidemic in town it can't be stopped by denying its existence."

So the "Express" announced the appearance of infantile paralysis, and was berated and threatened, and suffered the loss of advertising, while precautions were taken and the spread of disease checked.

Once, at the end of a hard day:

"Miss Burnham, I wonder if you'd come in here a moment."

His expression was half smiling, half embarrassed. Janet spread her notebook on his desk edge.

"No; no dictation." Then, after a pause. "I just wanted to have you sit here a moment. I'm tired, and you're . . . you're so tranquil, Miss Burnham!"

It was the first attempt at personalities, and she stiffened; but on the heels of that reaction came an appreciation of the weariness in his posture. The sort of men she knew would never have been so direct. They had pride and restraint; this man had only honesty. So she laughed lightly, interested, and said that perhaps tranquillity was only on the surface.

"I don't think so. I've watched you." He looked at her broodingly—an impersonal stare. "You have composure—and many other qualities. The chance I took with you worked out. You're a crackerjack, Miss Burnham! I had you down for an insultingly small raise this week, but we're so short . . . and one of the boys in the mailing-room had to send his wife to a hospital yesterday. I've got to give him a chance for her."

She made no reply, and when she left, after he had talked haphazardly of some of the paper's problems, she carried with her a sort of admiration and sympathy for the man.

The work was distasteful though, in many ways. So foreign to her training! She was out of place in that office; out of place in her tiny apartment. She was lonely for ease, leisure, comfort; hungry for the love that would give her that valued sense of stability; a bit weary, wondering what the quality in man might be which would let her love, which would bring her to a safe mooring. . . .

The paving scandal broke. Respected names were scourged, rotten conditions in the city's political life laid bare, and this brought on Howell's head more threats, increased the obstacles in his way to established security. More scurryings on pay day, more stormy interviews with creditors, while Janet stood between Howell and unnecessary detail.

He came out of his office late one afternoon.

"Look here, Miss Burnham, you've been around the shop long enough to know that I mean what I say, haven't you?"

"I have," wonderingly. He was so much in earnest.

"Good! I have two things to say: The first is that whatever answer you give to the second will alter things here not one jot. The other is that I'd like to call on you. I can't make love to a woman in my office!"

She leaped to her feet then; but the indignant words in her constricted throat did not come. After a brief pause she laughed, giddily. That Marc Howell should want to make love to the daughter of a Burnham! And yet he was so honest in his lack of restraint. . . . Why, it was a challenge to all she had ever held desirable!

"Good!" he said, and grinned queerly. "I've always been afraid of going off half-cocked. You don't like it. I'm sorry."

He turned away as if to hide the real torment that strangled him.

"Why, Mr. Howell, you may call on me," she heard herself saying. One could not be downed by a man from behind the mills, could one?

He went a bit white and bowed gravely. "That is generous," he said.

HE CALLED, toward the end of the week, and Janet waited for him with the oddest conflict of emotion that she had ever experienced.

He did not make love to her. He talked about himself, his paper.

"Why, when I was a kid and used to be out all day on hot pavements or in cold winds, I used to believe every blessed thing I could spell out in the papers! I didn't believe my father; I don't remember my mother. Most of the men I knew were braggarts and liars. But I believed the papers I sold. I believed in my job.

"That's why, when I finally got inside and saw that the 'Express' was not always infallible, I wanted to make it so. The only way I could do that was to own it. That's what I'm trying to do—make my ownership secure."

He laughed and rubbed his hands over his knees, great, strong hands; and Janet watched them, wondering how they would feel, holding hands like hers. Such rough hands, like his voice! Uncouth . . . uncouth? He was talking:

"I never wanted to be any journalistic messiah, but I've got to keep on believing in my job if I'm going to be happy in it. Things just happened to steer me into the newspaper business; but here I am, and I've got to make my place and keep it, in that business. It's what I want more than anything else in the world, I guess . . . more than almost anything—to keep the 'Express' going. It's all I've ever had, you see; it's a dream slowly coming true that I dreamed when I was a kid . . . yonder, where most of us were without any incentive beyond keeping warm and fed. It'd be easier to build a sound financial foundation by using a little bunk, maybe—"

He looked around the room; old, honest furniture; mellow pictures; subdued lights; a soft Oriental rug on the floor. . . .

"No bunk in your background," he said, as though drawing an analogy. "Your foundation had no bunk in it. It's the only kind worth while, isn't it?"

So personal, so intimate, that question. She had been oddly impressed by his enthusiasm for his objective and the processes of attainment. Now, she felt, the thing he had come to say was imminent.

But she was wrong. He did not even expect a reply to his question.

"That's what I've learned from watching you . . . about your kind. You're free from bunk. It seems the satisfactory answer to all the questions I used to ask myself about people who—who stood for something in the city, whether they did much or not. That quality goes all through your lives, I guess." He stroked the chair arm. "No veneer, here; honest, solid walnut. That rug, mellowed by use. . . . It must be a comfortable feeling to own a background like that."

And then, back to his own ambitions again.

NO WORD of that announced love-making. She wondered, as she stood watching him swing down the street with his long strides, what his attitude would be on the morrow.

Men, her sort, did not use slang habitually; neither did they talk so enthusiastically about themselves. They had that same pride in attainment, surely, but their training kept them silent. Why should it? What virtue there? She recalled now, that his roughness, his directness, had not jarred her after the first half-hour.

His greeting that next morning was as it always had been; when he looked at her his glance was unchanged. For a week, then, no personal word. She wondered if it was only because he was harried by a series of minor crises.

Then, abruptly, in the midst of a trying problem: "Did I talk myself out of a welcome the other night?"

"Do you want to come again, Mr. Howell?"

"More than anything else in the world!" holding his voice steady.

"Then, won't you, please? And often?" she added, for a reason obscure even to herself. Later she thought it must be because her curiosity about him was as keen, now, as his had been about her.

As she listened to his talk, she thought that out again. He had been without restraint in his desire to know her kind; she had covered her interest, held it back. Foolish! She said abruptly:

"You wanted to know about me. Now, I want to know. (Continued on page 187)

I Retired At Forty— But I Couldn't Stand It Long!

By Frederick L. Collins

WHEN I was a little boy, I edited, published, and wrote a weekly newspaper called "The Home Wreath." Its edition was limited to one copy, because that was all Mother had time to sew up the back. But its editorial policy was none the less vigorous because of its limited sphere of influence. The doings of Father, Benjamin Harrison, and Mike Kelly—"Slide-Kelly-Slide" Kelly—were worshipfully chronicled, and the conduct of Grover Cleveland, who chanced to differ from Father in his political affiliations, was thoroughly anathematized. In short, "The Home Wreath" was a good, clean family paper.

Mother was sure that I had hitched my wagon to Pegasus's flying hoofs, and that nothing could stop me from becoming an Immortal. So I set out to be a newspaper man. Hammond Lamont gave me my first job. He was editing "The Evening Post" in New York. Then, two good men in the periodical field—Charles Lanier and George Hazen—labored successively to turn me into an honest-to-God magazine publisher. And to a degree they succeeded. For, in November, 1911, eight years after I first came to New York, I started my own company.

For six years, I heard only the whirring of the business engine and the grinding of the business gears, from the standpoint of the man who has to look the operating statements in the face. Moreover, I deviated still further from the straight path of literary virtue by flirting with that most commercial infant, the motion picture. I became active in the management of several corporations, and experienced the joy of drawing several sizable salaries at one and the same time.

What cared I for Pegasus now? I was making a terrible dent in "The Directory of Directors." And that was glory enough for any man!

Came the war, as the movie captions say.

Somehow or other I didn't feel the same about business afterward. I had no desire to go back to my job. But I wasn't foolish enough to turn at once from activity to inactivity. And, as a matter of fact, I couldn't have done so if I had wished. My business obligations died hard; even their obsequies dragged interminably. Moreover, I happened to be very much interested in the Periodical Publishers' Association; so I fussed around for a time with the affairs of that semi-commercial organization. Then, I spent a year or two on other half-business, half-altruistic schemes. I remember that I worked up a great enthusiasm over the use of films in schools and colleges; held windy conferences with distinguished educators; wrote memoranda; drew up plans of organization; fancied myself a very busy man. What I was really doing, though I didn't have the sense to know it, was trying to prolong my old business life by means of artificial respiration.

In the interest of one of these synthetic ventures, I went to Europe, and visited, among others, my old publishing friend, Lord Northcliffe. In front of the fire, in the little old house where Northcliffe used to write "Answers," he asked me the question which I had thus far refused to answer to myself.

"What are you going to do," he said, "when you go back to America?"

I knew in my heart that I was through with chasing rainbow visions. There was nothing to this playing at work. A fellow had to be all out, or all in. So I answered rather discouragedly:

"Go back into business again, I suppose."

"Don't do it," he replied, placing a friendly hand on my shoulder, "if I had had two years off at your age, I would have twenty years ahead of me now."

I never saw him again. He died while I was still in Europe. And to this day, I don't know whether it was the sequel to his words or the words themselves that strengthened my wavering resolve to "get out." Anyhow, on the way home to New York, I decided that Northcliffe was right. For two years, perhaps for always, I would do nothing.

My family thought I was crazy. My friends laughed at me. My enemies suspected my motives. Nobody could understand how a man who had been active all his life should suddenly make a god of inactivity. At least, they pretended that they didn't understand—although I am sure that the urge to quit is much more common than people admit. The number of business men who actually do retire at forty is necessarily limited. In that sense, my case was a peculiar one. But the number who would retire at that age, or even younger, if they could, is substantially *un*limited; and their reasons for thinking they would like to do so are doubtless very like my own.

I wasn't any lazier than the next man. In fact, I wasn't lazy at all. At school, I had done a good job at my studies; and I was the kind of fellow who was always "on the paper." In those first years in New York, I had worked grimly to get ahead. And as the twenty-nine-year-old boss of a good-sized publishing house, I had had to keep grinding to make up for youthful deficiencies. My labor record was good. And I think it usually is in the case of the man who yearns to quit. The lazy man never works hard enough to make business a burden; and he seldom earns enough money to make quitting a possibility. But the busy man tires himself out; and, if he can afford it, he begins to look about for relief.

So, first of all, I was tired; so tired that I had begun to look upon leisure as an exciting and a constructive thing. I longed to live what I called "the physical life." Like most brain workers, I cherished the notion that I had neglected my body for my head. Of course, I hadn't. The average business man leads a pretty regular life. I don't suppose there is a more healthful one in the annals of civilized man. He doesn't eat too much; he can't drink a great deal; and if his smoking bothers him at all, he is almost sure to be keen enough about his job to taper off to safety. At forty, he is apt to be disturbingly fit. I was. But, in leisure, I hoped to attain boisterous health, amounting to perfection.

IN LEISURE, too, I hoped to find freedom. There is nothing which the average business man thinks he wants so much as freedom. Of course, he is the freest mortal that ever walked this earth. The man who works can work as hard as he likes, and nobody will molest him. The man at the head of a modern business has the power of life and death over ideas and policies, over reputations and careers. He leads, as the phrase goes, his own life. But he seldom appreciates this almost feudal power. I didn't. I felt that I had been buffeted about from one hard day's work to another, forced always to do something that I really didn't wish to do, never allowed to choose for myself either the beginning or the end of my road. In leisure, then, I would find freedom.

And it didn't seem too much to hope that I should find time. I was sure that I never had found it. Otherwise, I would have learned to tell the good-sounding opera singers from the good-looking ones, I would have become what I was sure I could become if only I had time—a cultured man. As a matter of fact, the two most important things in life are the world and the people in it. And a good business man cannot know too much about either.

There was no limit to the amount of "culture" which I might have acquired, to my great advantage, in the course of my daily job. But I didn't see it that way then. I wished to be high-brow in a high-hat way. In leisure, and only in leisure, would I find time to live!

As a matter of fact, I had begun my new life by spending a good deal of this excess time in bed. Every morning—for a week—I slept until nine, ten, or even eleven o'clock.

It was good stuff, as long as it lasted. But, by the end of a week, habit began to reassert itself. For many years, I had got up at seven o'clock: a practice for which I had successively blamed my mother, my school, and my business. But now, after I had thrown off the parental, the pedagogical, and the commercial yokes, I found myself actually preferring to get up at seven. What had seemed to me at first the fatigue of a lifetime had disappeared in the first week of unusual sleep. There was still no reason why I shouldn't slumber the clock around; but there was evidently no physical excuse for doing so. I woke at seven ready for the day.

And such a day! I read not long ago about a man in Jersey who retired from business after twenty-five years of honorable labor. He quit on a Friday. The following Tuesday he was dead. My case was worse than that. I quit, but I didn't die.

It was nearly twenty years since I had written anything more formidable than my name. Now, I bent awkwardly and lengthily over the most unimportant letter. Usually, I made a mistake about two thirds of the way through, and had to start all over again. Then, there was the envelope. I hadn't addressed a half-dozen envelopes since I stopped writing love letters. And I hadn't licked a stamp for so long that I had forgotten the taste.

UP TO this time, I had given only the vaguest thought to where all the sharpened pencils came from; the ink well that wasn't dry, the erasers, blotting pads and paper. All these things were "supplied." I had had no idea what a wonderful institution a good purchasing department could be, until I tried to get along without one. The average home desk is the most polyglot of all our national institutions. It is the catch-all, but not the melting-pot, of most of the different kinds of stationery in the world. No two pieces are alike; they seldom belong to the same family. And neither do the pens!

As for the telephone, I was forced to get acquainted with it all over again. I had known it as a reasonably well-mannered instrument. It never rang in my hearing unless somebody had convinced somebody else that the conversation would be on a subject that was interesting to me. Now, it rang at all sorts of times and for all sorts of reasons; and it kept on ringing until somebody answered. Of course, I wasn't obliged to answer it myself; but I couldn't sit still doing nothing while that hideous sound was ringing through the house. Nine times out of ten, it was for some other member of the household, usually a kitchen member. The tenth time, it was more than likely to be the wrong number—or an adolescent inquiry for my small daughter.

On outgoing calls, I was helpless. I had been accustomed to lifting the receiver off the hook and saying: "Get me Mr. Smith, please," and when my buzzer rang, Smith was there. But by the time I had looked up my first number for myself, forgotten it and looked it up again, and told it to Central with the second "3" left out, and had turned again in fury to that terrible book —by that time, I was convinced that there was no place in all the world like a well-run office.

And a good stenographer: she is God's most blessed creation. Who got my tickets when I was going away? Who called up and found when the train went, and whether it was on time? Who kept my check book and made out my income tax? Who did these things now? Nobody. Except, occasionally and laboriously, me!

It was absurd, of course, to be bothered by such a petty thing as having to do my odd jobs myself. But the average business man without his organization is as helpless as a baby. He is a nuisance, not only to himself, but to the family on which he has thrust himself. My household was most considerate. I have no doubt that in time we might have worked out a system that would have made life more worthwhile for all of us. But it was inevitable in the beginning that I should be treated in my new environment with something not much better than tolerance. As a Sunday and night-time feature, I had been enthusiastically welcome. But as a continuous performance, I soon lost my appeal.

I didn't mind moving out of my room to let the vacuum cleaner in, but I began to suspect that the wielder of the instrument regarded me as a domestic nuisance. The household used to move around me; now, I moved around the household. Problems in algebra had gone unsolved rather than "bother poor tired Father;" now they became my daily fodder. Errands used to be total strangers to me; now they were my constant companions. Even the cook would ask if I couldn't run out and get something that the grocery boy had forgotten to deliver!

Frederick L. Collins, widely known writer, was born in Lowell, Massachusetts, in 1882. Before he began to write regularly, he had had long experience as an editor and publisher

It was plain that the erstwhile head of the house was in danger of becoming the foot. And it was equally plain that he would do well to get out before he was thrown out.

ALL this was natural and understandable. Man rules in one kingdom; woman in another. I had been a king; now, I was a subject. It was hard for me; I dare say it was harder for my family. A woman has to do her job in her own way. She has to bring her home up to scratch for the normal time when her h sband's key turns in the old front door, just as a business man brings his profit and loss operations up to the final balance sheet at the end of the fiscal year. And she prefers to do it without too close observation along the way. She doesn't want a great husky man sitting around the house figuring out how he could do the family housekeeping on a three-crew shift. She doesn't, if the naked truth must be faced, want him sitting around at all.

It got so that I was ashamed to stay home any more than I had to, so I sought refuge in two clubs to which I belonged. One of them was in the country. I had played golf there every fine week-end ever since I could (Continued on page 172)

The Show Must Go On

A brave story of Koko the clown and his little crippled son

By Anne Fuller

Illustrated by Joseph Simont

Seated on the first elephant's head laughing and chuckling and waving his hands in their big white cotton gloves was Koko, Eddie's father

AS MISS BEAMISH came down the long corridor, her blue and white uniform rustled cheerfully, and the early morning sunlight lingered intimately in the hair which glinted under her pert white cap. Because Miss Beamish was young and gay of spirit the children in the hospital had shortened her name to "Beamy;" and because of her gentle kindness they loved her.

As she came toward Ward C, the tinkle of little voices reached her ears. Miss Beamish always listened for the voices of the children, for their tone was her forecast of the many little moods inside the ward. Sometimes the voices were fretful and cross. That meant that Miss Beamish must summon all the sternness she possessed and put away her smiles until the voices changed.

Sometimes, too many times, the voices were anguished. Then Miss Beamish's bright eyes softened with sadness, for the voices told her that the dark hours of the night had been marked by pain. But today the voices were happy, so Miss Beamish smiled her brightest smile, and as she opened the ward door some of the morning sunshine seemed to hurry through it with her.

For a moment the children did not see her. During the night a new child had been brought to the hospital, and all the excited talk was directed toward him. He lay there, his body making a very miniature mountain, in the whiteness of his little bed, his eyes starry, as he listened.

The spokesman was Eddie. Miss Beamish and Eddie were very old and tried friends, for Eddie had spent almost half his brief life in Ward C. He had come there as sad a little specimen of humanity as anyone ever saw. It was not neglect that had made Eddie that way; rather, he had been loved too well; but not wisely. His mother had loved him so much that she had given her life for him without even seeing him; and his father had given his baby love enough for two.

But a father who is Koko, the most famous of circus clowns, living the kaleidoscopic life of a big circus, hasn't very much time to give to a little son. The circus, which was the breath of life to Koko, had been too much for Eddie. Some obscure and terrible thing had stricken Eddie's little spine, and the atoms of feet, meant to carry a sturdy little boy around, hung limp and useless.

FOR over three years now, from his crib Eddie had watched the world of the hospital go on before his eyes. It was a world as changing as the circus world—but different. Eddie had seen dozens of other little boys come—and go. He had grown from a wan baby to a very small little boy whose white face was dominated by blue eyes several sizes too large for it. Everything possible had been done for him; but the little legs had never moved. All the doctors said that only a miracle-working operation would ever make them move now. And there was no one of them who dared attempt it.

Miss Beamish loved Eddie, as did everyone else. He was always so good. He never whimpered or complained, as the other children did. He was a pensive little boy who sat propped up in the small domain of his bed, looking reflectively at life with big, questioning eyes. He was not very talkative.

There were just two topics that excited him and made the words tumble out, two topics so closely related that they were one—the circus and Koko, his famous father. And as Miss Beamish stood listening in the doorway, Eddie was talking of these, his heart's dearest, and enthralling the new child with glamorous details.

"And my father'd let me sit on the effalunt's back, and when he brings the circus to the hospital today maybe he'll let you do it too! Honest!"

But the new child was slow to believe. "Aw, say," he answered, his words contrasting pitiably with the angelic innocence of his face. "Listen to the kid! What-cha givin' us? Nobody ain't never heard of no horspital where they have any free circuses!"

An expression of hurt dignity settled on Eddie's face. He looked away from the unbeliever, blinking his eyes rapidly and swallowing hard. Then he saw Miss Beamish, and turned toward her eyes that held panic in their wide blueness. There was anxiety and supplication in his frail voice.

"O-o-o-h, Beamy!" he faltered, pointing a bud of a finger at the newcomer. "He says there won't be a circus today. I'm right, aren't I? There will be the circus, won't there? And isn't my pop coming in to see us this morning? You . . . tell him!"

Miss Beamish smiled from one to the other of the tiny combatants. "Of course, it is too good to believe," she said; "but the circus is coming to see us today. You see," she went on, crossing the floor and twinkling down at the new little boy as she stood by his bed, "it's like this:

"Once upon a time, there was a very good man who loved children a great deal, so he knew how much they liked circuses. And he thought to himself that boys and girls who were sick were so good, and had to be so patient, that they deserved to see the circus even more than well ones. So he asked Doctor Brush, who is in charge of all this big hospital full of boys and girls, if he could bring the circus to the hospital every year when it comes to town. And now the circus comes every single year.

"They parade all the way out through the streets, with bands and steam pianos and everything. Then they come right into our back yard, and we take all of you outside there"—she pointed toward the courtyard which lay in a pool of sunlight outside the window—"and you can see the whole show!"

THE child's face was ecstatic as he peered up at her. "And elephants?" he whispered, his voice tempered with awe.

"Well, I should say so!" Miss Beamish reassured him. "And clowns!" She pointed to the bit of a boy whose minute chest expanded at the mention of the word. "Eddie's father is the head of all the clowns. They call him Koko, and he's the funniest man in the whole world!"

Doubt was erased from the boy's face

Within the walls of the hospital two other people were tense with an emotion that gripped them as the joy of the circus gripped all the little spectators outside—the emotion of suspense and he glowed with a transfiguring belief. "Gosh!" he said.

Then the excited patter of voices rose in a twittering chorus, and the convert was showered with more details than even his eager mind could absorb. Eddie still led the talk; but the others were not far behind him. They all spoke with assurance, for they had talked of nothing else but the circus for days—talked of it, dreamed of it.

They had played menagerie too, with Eddie as the baby lion behind the bars of his white crib. He had done his best; but even to the soaring imaginations of the other children there was something lacking in a baby lion whose roar was so tiny, and who had to lie so very still in his cage.

Now that the day of days was here, the children were more excited than ever. In every ward, in every little white bed, there was an exclamation point of a child who looked forward with an intensity of eagerness that marked no other day in the year as it did this one. And of all the children, Eddie was the most excited, the most eager. For Eddie's excitement was not born of a week's expectation; it was the cumulative result of a whole long year. While the other children talked and dreamed of the circus for a week or so, Eddie thought of it all the time.

To the others it was a dream come true, a spectacle to be regarded breathlessly from a distance. But Eddie was part of it. He belonged to the circus. To him it was so very much more than one crowded, glittering little while, to be forgotten in a surprisingly short time after the last elephant had flicked his ridiculous tail through the straight gate of the hospital.

THE circus meant to Eddie the only real joy he had ever known. It meant the only home he had ever had. And, more than all these, it meant his father, his wonderful father, who could make a little boy forget that there was such a thing in the world as pain. And today his father was coming! Even the sacred routine of the hospital had been laid aside so that he might spend the whole morning with his little son, instead of coming with all the other visitors for one short hour in the afternoon.

The breakfast trays with their round blue bowls of cereal were brought in and taken away. The hour for baths was much more placid than usual, for what is the mere inconvenience of a bath, when the circus is coming? At last all the little beds in their even rows around the walls stood as fresh and smooth and white as the petals of a big flower; and in each bed a tense bit of humanity waited bright-eyed for the coming of the great moment.

In his crib in the far corner of the ward, his hair against his pillows like a bit of pale gold, Eddie lay as still as a doll in its cradle, his eyes squeezed shut so tight that his little parody of a nose wrinkled.

He was playing a game with himself. He was going to keep his eyes closed until he heard footsteps coming toward his bed. Not just any footsteps would do. There was only one step that would make him open his eyes, like the Princess in the fairy tale, whose eyes could be opened only by the kiss of one who really loved her.

At the sound of the ward door opening Eddie's eyelids squinched tighter than ever. But the footstep was not the one he was waiting for. It was only Miss Preble, the fat probationer, going around hanging the temperature charts on the little hooks on the foot of the beds. She passed him; he heard her footsteps go around the ward and back to the door, and the slap of the door as it closed behind her.

Then there was a time that seemed very long to Eddie in his self-imposed darkness. Several times his little eyelids fluttered uncertainly, as though they would defy him and let in the light in spite of all the strength of his baby will. But at last the door opened, very slowly, to be sure, and the plod of big footsteps came toward him.

Oh, how the eyelids wanted to flick open just for one reassuring second! Nearer! Nearer! Now Eddie could distinguish that there were two pairs of footsteps, instead of one. One of them, then, would be nice young Doctor Curtis, who had special charge of Ward C, and who always grinned so happily at Miss Beamish whenever he saw her. And there could be no mistake about the quick, vibrant pad of the other feet.

He couldn't wait any longer! Like the wings of a white butterfly the fragile lids flashed open, and the periwinkle eyes beneath them were excited almost to the brightness of tears.

Yes, there, smiling down at him with his round brown eyes, was Doctor Curtis. Eddie's blue gaze did not linger on him. He could see the "Doc" every day. His look flashed joyfully to the owner of the other footsteps, then grew blank, and the miniature face drooped with trouble. For with the Doc was someone Eddie had never seen before, a great big someone, who towered over his bed just as Goliath, the circus giant, loomed over Sir Toby, the smallest midget.

This was a shaggy mountain of a man, who looked intently at Eddie with eyes like steel buttons, and whose face was almost hidden from view behind a gray beard that rushed away from the middle of his chin as though he were facing a high wind.

HE SNAPPED his sharp eyes from the baby cowering back against his pillows, to Doctor Curtis, and spoke in a voice as unexpectedly gentle as the hum of a great bass viol.

"You did not tell me, Monsieur Doctor, that he was so tiny, this little one. Nevertheless, we shall see."

Eddie regarded him with bewildered eyes. "See what?" he wondered. Were they going to see if he was too little to go to the circus? If only his father would come, everything would be all right, he knew!

The Doc came to him and patted his bit of a shoulder with a kind hand. "Eddie," he said, "this is Doctor Ronssoy. He comes all the way across the ocean from a place called France. He knows all about boys and girls, and he wants to have a look at the old feet. He's not going to hurt you. All right?"

That was what the whiskery man wanted, was it? This was nothing new to Eddie. There had been so many who had wanted the same thing. Eddie knew the routine by heart. Someone would turn back the covers of his crib. Then the inquisitive one would wiggle his toes and hit him gently on his knees with a funny little rubber hammer. Then he'd be turned over so that his face was buried in the pillow. He kind of liked that, because he could stretch out his shoulders while the hum of conversation went on over his head and soft fingers gently prodded his misbehaving spine.

Then he'd be turned back again, and for a few minutes the doctors would stand by his bedside holding up to the light strange black and white shadowy pictures which Eddie thought that the Doc called "Eddie's extra-plates." Then there would be a shaking of heads, and the doctors would go away, leaving the smoothness of the bed so tumbled that Miss Beamish would have to come back and straighten it all out again. It was always the same.

SO EDDIE met the comradely grin on the Doc's face with a wisp of a smile. "Sure," he said, in his piping voice, "it's all right, Doc. Only, say, listen, Doc," and he lowered his voice to a shrill whisper, "don't let him wrinkly me all up! My pop's coming, and I want to look nice for him."

"Not a wrinkle!" Doctor Curtis promised, as he turned the pocket-edition blankets back in a neat fold. "Will you begin your examination, sir?" he said, turning to the shaggy one, who stood looking down at the offending baby legs for a minute, his great fingers straying thoughtfully through his beard.

"Ah, yes," he said, "ah, yes." And bending closer he engulfed one of the tiny feet in a hand as gentle as a woman's, and as big and soft as a down pillow.

Then, with a series of "Humphs," he did as all the others had done. Each tiny toe was wiggled; the little rubber hammer was produced from the straw basket filled with funny, shiny things that the Doc carried on his arm. "Tap, tap," it came against his knee. "Tap, tap." Would it never stop? There! That was all of that.

Eddie heaved a pygmy sigh, and waited for the Doc to turn him over, so that his befringed visitor could run expert fingers up and down the lazy spine. But Doctor Ronssoy did not ask to have Eddie turned over. Instead, he stood looking hard at the too-quiet little toes and pulling at his ambush of beard.

"Yes," he rumbled finally, "yes, Monsieur Doctor, it could be done. But the risk is of a greatness that—" he stopped suddenly and turned kind, keen eyes toward the atom of a boy. "Well, you can judge. It would be either a success the most perfect, or—"

Eddie lay gazing up at the two men, his eyes blue pools of bewilderment. What were they talking about? It couldn't be about the circus. That was always a success, no matter what happened. What was it? Eddie was thinking so hard and watching the two faces above him so raptly that he did not hear the ward door open and close again behind the figure he had waited so long to see.

Even in the unobtrusive gray suit he wore there was something remarkable, arresting, about the man who stood in the doorway, something that made people smile happily and a bit wistfully when they looked at him. For Koko did not doff his personality with his clown's ruff and peaked hat. The appeal which made children laugh, and men and women forget for a moment that they were no longer children, was always with him.

It was there in the curve of the wide mouth, that needed no grease-paint smile to make it turn up rakishly at the corners. It was there in the funny way he cocked his head on one side. And it was there in the grown-up edition of Eddie's blue eyes, which danced like bright spots of concentrated joy in Koko's face.

Then suddenly Eddie saw him, and in his one word of greeting he voiced all the yearning of his year of lonely waiting. "Pop!" he called.

And as Koko came and gathered his little son in his arms, loneliness was forgotten and remembrance of pain was erased.

The Doc's voice broke in on the moment of ecstasy.

"Doctor Ronssoy, this is the boy's father," he said.

Doctor Ronssoy smiled behind his beard, and nodded his head. "It is well," he said to Koko, "that you have come. It would be a happiness to me if I might say a few words to you." He turned to Doctor Curtis: "There is, perhaps, somewhere we could talk? I would not excite the little one, and how is it you say it? Little pitchers hear much."

"Would you come with us a minute, sir?" Doctor Curtis said to Koko, and with a lingering pat on his little son's bright head, Koko followed the doctors out of the ward.

This was almost too much! A microscopic fury of resentment burned in Eddie's eyes as he watched the three figures go away from him. He felt sure that there was nothing important enough to take his pop away from him at that moment.

BUT in the spare brightness of the waiting-room outside the ward, Koko was listening to the deep-voiced words of Doctor Ronssoy, and the expression in his intent eyes said that the words were too important to miss even one of them.

"Yes," Doctor Ronssoy was saying, "as I said, it is well you came this day. I would have your consent before I attempt this operation. It is of such a delicacy, and there is so very much of danger in it, that I should hesitate otherwise."

Koko's blue eyes searched the doctor's face with a look of anguished absorption. "And you say," he said hesitatingly, "that—afterward—my boy will walk?"

"If the operation be a success, Monsieur. Otherwise—" Doctor Ronssoy shrugged massive shoulders. He hesitated, and then went on in his big, slow voice: "I think it only just, Monsieur, that you should know—all there is one can know about the chances. It may be he will walk again. It is with frankness I say that it is in the hand of God as well as in these hands." And he held out his great hands with their delicate fingers.

"It may be—" He stopped abruptly, and walked away from Koko, who watched him in an agony of anxiety as he turned his vast back on the room and stood a moment looking out of the window. Suddenly he wheeled about. "Monsieur," he said, "it would be a great pain for you to lose your little child. I have seen that. I know. Therefore, I tell you now that this may happen.

"There is but one chance in ten that he will—that he will survive the operation."

All the thousands who knew Koko of the circus ring would not have recognized him now

"And if you don't operate? I'd rather have him always as he is"—Koko's voice was almost a whisper—"than . . . than to lose him!"

"Ah, but, Monsieur, you could not keep your boy as he is now. There might be, at most, three, four years. Who can say? During those years the pain would not grow less. And the child's spirit, now so hopeful, so bright. . . . Can you not see? Too much suffering darkens the mind, Monsieur.

"Therefore, I say to you, your boy might live for a few short years; but, ah no, he would not be the same, either in mind or in body." He came toward Koko and laid a great, gentle hand on his arm. "Monsieur, I too have a son. I love him more than my life. Were this my son, I should know no hesitation."

All the thousands who knew the Koko of the circus ring would not have recognized him now. His eyes no longer laughed but in their depths was only remembered pain.

"One chance in ten, you said?" he faltered.

"Monsieur is right!"

Koko's hands trembled, then gripped each other in an iron clasp. "Give him his chance!" he said; and this time his voice did not falter.

In the quiet corridor Miss Beamish sat at her desk folding immaculate bits of gauze into perfect little squares. As Koko came from the waiting-room she saw him and came toward him, her hand extended in a gesture of sympathy.

"Doctor Curtis has just told me about . . . Eddie," she said. "No one has told him about it yet, and I wondered if you wouldn't like to be the one to do it. He'll be so disappointed to miss the circus!"

KOKO looked at her with grateful eyes. "Bless you!" he said, softly. "I would like to tell him. We've both got to help him, Miss Beamish. It's pretty hard for such a little tike to buck this all by himself."

Miss Beamish's eyes were bright as she answered: "I'll do all I can. You know that."

"I do; I do, indeed," he answered, and went from her into the ward, where Eddie waited him with unwhetted eagerness and greeted him with a joy-laden shout.

"Pop, the fellows want you to tell 'em about the circus. Pop—say—tell 'em about the time the baby effalunt ran away, will you?"

"Aren't you going to let your pop talk to you for a little while first?" Koko said, as he sat down in the stiff chair by the side of Eddie's crib. "Let's have a good old visit first, then I'll tell 'em all the stories I know."

Eddie smiled proudly up at his father. "Sure!" he agreed, in what he thought was a most manly voice.

Koko took Eddie's hand, which lay like a wee wax model on the counterpane.

"I've got a story to tell you about the circus," he said. "It's a story I've often told you; but I want you to listen harder than you ever have before, because you must understand what I'm going to say. When you grow to be a big man," Eddie felt his father's hand tighten on his, and his voice seemed to come all soft and husky, "you're

Riding The Rivers Down To The Sea

By George W. Gray

BACK in '98 the Alaska fever got Lewis R. Freeman, an undergraduate in Stanford University, and carried him off in the gold rush to the Klondike. He has been a nomad ever since. The Alaska episode introduced him to mountains, glaciers, and swift river water. A cruise to Tahiti, Samoa, and Fiji acquainted him with sailing ships, tropic isles, and blue sea. After this the round world was his.

He saw the Russo-Japanese War from the vantage point of Nogi's army before Port Arthur. He voyaged to Australia, South Africa, up the Zambezi and down the Niger and the Nile; zigzagged to London; caught a steamer for Brazil and spent two years wandering over South America and the West Indies. A brief stay home, and he was off again, this time to China. A roving excursion carried him through Borneo jungles, India, the Himalayas, Arabia, Syria, Egypt, Tripoli—with Dyaks, Malays, Negritos, Arabs, and a score of other native varieties as trail mates. After poking into odd corners of every part of the world, he says that, of all the wonders he has seen, rivers interest him the most.

"But why rivers?" I asked, "any more than mountains, jungles, or seas?"

"I like the aliveness of a river," answered the explorer. "Also, I suppose, the excitement of getting somewhere. As an old sergeant of the Gama Patrol once put it to me, river boating comes natural—it's not opposed to nature, like mountain-climbing, for instance, where you are bucking the law of gravity from start to finish. You just get into your boat and let it go. Sooner or later, dead or alive, you arrive somewhere.

"THERE is a sensitive quality about a river," Mr. Freeman went on. "It can be—and generally is—as temperamental as a cat. Every stream has its distinctive personality. Some are such pugnacious characters that they overpower the waters into which they pour. A striking example is the case of the Mississippi, which flows for nearly twelve hundred miles before it is joined by the Missouri. Thereafter, it is quite a different river, simply because the turbulent Missouri dominates it. Some authorities have reasoned that the Missouri is the main river and the Upper Mississippi the tributary. But if you track the Missouri back to its sources in the Rocky Mountains, as I did a few years ago, you find that it, too, is a mild-mannered stream before it is joined by a boisterous tributary, the Yellowstone, which thereafter domineers over it. On this basis it might be argued that the great river which pours past New Orleans to the Gulf is, precisely speaking, not the Mississippi nor yet the Missouri, but the Yellowstone."

SOME rivers are habitually quiet and lamblike—the gentle Concord; the placid Charles, in Massachusetts. The Hudson is majestic, with its broad strip of unhurried water edged by the green Catskills and the brown Palisades. So is the spreading James, in Virginia, which was characterized by an early explorer as "one of the famousest rivers that ever was found by any Christian." In this same class of broad, stately streams, whose lower reaches are really arms of the sea, with daily tides, are the Potomac, the Thames, in England, and the St. Lawrence, in Canada. The last is also the cleanest of the world's big rivers, because the Great Lakes serve as settling basins and clear the muddy waters before they pour into the St. Lawrence. It is in striking contrast to the tawny Missouri, whose mud is carried all the way down to St. Louis and even on to the Gulf. One branch of the Nile is blue, another is white, colored by the clays carried in solution.

"But the champion for mud, as well as for savagery," said Mr. Freeman, "is the Colorado as it tumbles through the Grand Canyon in Arizona. No wonder it has cut there the deepest scar in the face of the earth. The water is so thick with silt that you actually feel the added weight. Oars bend and sometimes snap, as they might if one were trying to row in quicksilver, and when a wave strikes you the blow is terrific. Big waves in all swift water come down with tremendous force; but the combers of the Grand Canyon have an added wallop, mainly because they are weighted with tons of mud.

"I was with the engineers of the Geological Survey in their expedition through the Grand Canyon in 1923," continued Mr. Freeman, "and both saw and felt something of the solidity which Colorado water can assume. At one point we discovered a new rapid, formed apparently by a slide of rock from a cliff. Originally, it must have dammed up the river considerably, but gradually the current had swept the looser rocks down the steep chute, leaving only one huge block of limestone planted squarely in midstream. The effect of this rock, when hit by the furious tumble of water, was to throw back a wave more than ten feet high and create behind it a deep whirlpool.

"WE CAMPED above this jagged pitch of water, and took time to study it. We saw that, because of the throw-off of the big wave, there was no danger of colliding with the rock. The wave completely cushioned the obstruction. The really serious danger lay in being capsized and sucked down into the whirlpool. The problem, therefore, was to steer as far as possible from the wave, keeping in mind, also, not to get too close to the ragged cliffs which walled the river on either side. We selected the channel on the right of the rock as our best passage. The current seemed stronger on this side, and the more powerful the current, the quicker it would whisk us past the danger point.

"We had four boats—the 'Marble,' the 'Boulder,' the 'Glen,' and the 'Grand,' all names borrowed from the Colorado canyons we were exploring. The boats were especially designed for Colorado river navigation—each a trifle over sixteen feet long, decked over, with a cockpit for the oarsman in the middle, and with two hatches, fore and aft, clamped down on water-tight compartments which carried our provisions, instruments, and other stores. I was skipper and crew of the 'Grand,' and it was with some relief that I watched the 'Marble' and the 'Boulder' negotiate the dangerous passage.

"The 'Glen' was next. As it dropped into the chute I cast off in the 'Grand,' and a moment later the 'Glen' was almost abreast of the wave. I saw her edging perilously near, in spite of the boatman's frantic efforts to get into the safe channel.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Then, in a flash, I saw her bottom boards as she tipped on her side almost perpendicularly. She hung there on the uprush of water, and in the same moment I saw the flick of a flying oar and the body of the boatman sprawling through the air. A second later all had disappeared into the descending foam. I was at the brink of the chute, and realized that I was about to run through myself and learn what had happened.

"I learned in quick order. Running a rapid calls for such concentration and attention that a man hasn't time to be afraid or nervous, or to think of anything but his own precious bark. The 'Grand' slid down that chute of frothing water like a toboggan. In the split part of a second, so it seemed, the wave loomed above me, enormous, dark, threatening—like a crag. Then we bumped, for the 'Grand' shook as though we had hit the rock. But the rock was more than twelve feet away, and we had only grazed water—a geyser of the tumbling Colorado.

"My boat quickly righted and we sped on with the current. I caught a glimpse of the whirlpool as we shot past. It was fully five feet deep, and I could see a log of driftwood which it was twirling and splintering against the rock.

"IN THE eddy below the rapids I found the 'Glen,' already righted, the boatman bailing the cockpit. He was unhurt, and he confirmed my own impression of the solidity of the wave. He said his boat snapped up under its impact as though it had been struck on its gunwale by a pile-driver, and he found himself flung into space like a pebble from a sling. It was fortunate for him—and for us all—that those rapids are not broken with numerous boulders, as so many are.

"As we advanced down the Grand Canyon, the river rose under the flood of a freshet, and the weight of the water increased. A splash of it left a plaster coating on the skin as it dried—and not a day passed that we were not drenched. The effect of this liquid mud on the eyes was almost blinding. So opaque was the water that you couldn't see your hand two inches under the surface. I don't think anyone who looks down into the Grand Canyon upon that ribbon of a river threading its way among the cliffs and boulders a mile below thinks of the Colorado as a formidable stream. The river is dwarfed by the chasm; it is almost lost in the stupendous scale of its setting. But those who have trusted themselves to the Colorado in a boat know what a ferocious ruffian it is."

"How is it different from any other husky river?" I asked.

"The great cliffs make the difference. Its rapids are not rougher than those of the Columbia; in fact, I'd say that one of the worst stretches of water in the world is the three miles of rock-fanged river in the Big Bend of the Columbia known as Surprise Rapids. But a boatman is not compelled to run Surprise Rapids. He can get out and 'line'; that is, drift the boat alongside with a line attached and with a pole to poke it off the rocks. Or, if lining becomes too dangerous, he can resort to 'portage'—lift the boat ashore and carry it around the danger spot. But in stretch after stretch of the Grand Canyon no such thing as lining or portage is possible. The cliffs rise for thousands of feet on each side of the river, sheer walls without even a toehold, and a boatman has to run the rapids because he cannot turn back."

One of the worst of this kind is met in the lower gorge. Powell, the first explorer to go through the Grand Canyon, named it Separation Rapid, because here his expedition split up, three members of the party refusing to go any farther into the unknown. This occurred in 1869. Twenty years later, another explorer, Stanton, confronted by this same stretch of river, wrote in his journal: "As I looked down into that pit of fury, I wondered if it were possible for our boats to go through and come out whole, and right side up." Stanton soon found out. He came through the rapids alive, but his boat was overturned and had a hole rammed through it.

"UNFORTUNATELY," continued Mr. Freeman, "Separation Rapid did not look as bad in 1923 as Stanton had pictured it, else I should not have been so cocksure. I watched the 'Glen' put out and get a heavy tossing in the big waves where the second riffle began. Solid water was rolling right over it, but the boat got through. The 'Grand' could do the same thing easily, I thought. Hadn't she already ridden waves twenty feet high? Wasn't she guaranteed to be non-capsizable?

"I had two passengers. Whenever it was possible for survey members of the party to get around rough water on foot, they did so; but where the river walls were precipitous rocks they had to ride the boats. Doctor Moore, the geologist, and E. C. LaRue, hydrographic engineer, traveled with me. They rode lying flat on deck, faces down, Moore on the forward hatch and LaRue aft, each holding by the hand ropes strung along the gunwales. I sat in the cockpit and wielded the oars. Thus laden, and with about half a ton of cargo below deck, we eased out into the grip of the current.

"What happened came quicker than I can tell it. I was pulling to keep the stern well on the tumbling waves on the left, when a sneaking gray comber on the right lifted as easily as a bird rising from the water, caught the boat under the right gunwale, and the next instant the 'Grand' flopped over—bottom up.

"As I hit the water, I dropped the oars and dived, remembering a boatman who had been cupped under his cockpit in just such an upset. It was a successful dive all right—deep down into the muddy Colorado—and for some seconds I was pawing around in the submarine darkness, gulping water, grabbing frantically for the surface. A vicious swirl shot me to the top, only to suck me down before I got a full breath. When next I came up, I was able to keep my head above, and saw the bottom-up boat adrift ten or fifteen feet down-stream.

"I FLOUNDERED after it. Moore was hanging on by one of the side ropes, and a few seconds later I caught a glimpse of LaRue bobbing through the water on the end of the other rope. I grabbed a hold, and the derelict towed the three of us through the third riffle in a perfect tumult of noise and tumbling waves and spray. The roar of the rapids was like that of an express train at full speed, and even when we had floated below into quieter water our conversation was limited to the sign language. Two of the other boatmen came to our assistance, and in an eddy against the cliff we righted the boat, bailed the cockpit, and soon had the 'uncapsizable' 'Grand' back into commission. I've had spills before, but never a more vicious or completely unexpected one."

Five days after this adventure, the four boats came out of the canyon, (Continued on page 159)

Scattergood And The Six Big Men

By Clarence Budington Kelland

ILLUSTRATED BY PAUL MEYLAN

SCATTERGOOD BAINES was driving home from a business engagement in Higgins Bridge. It was late afternoon, and the old hardware merchant dozed in his seat, while his horse seemed also to sleep, even while it ambled along. They followed the curve of the river, now climbing to some shelf high above swirling rapids, now descending gently to a meadow where the stream spread itself into excellent trout pools. It was a lovely road, dusty, it is true, but flecked with sunlight as it laughed its way through the leaves.

Something agitated the bushes upon the rocky slope above the road, something unnoticed by the somnolent Scattergood. Some man or creature was making a floundering progress toward the highway. Then, just as the ancient buggy rounded a shoulder of rock, the bushes were thrust apart and a man rolled down the dozen feet of pitch, to bring up in the road almost under the horse's hoofs.

The sedate animal snorted and leaped sidewise. Scattergood started awake, saw the crumpled figure and, with agility incredible in one so stout, was over the wheel and bending down to scrutinize the man, who stirred and moaned and struggled to rise.

One could not tell if he were old or young, or what was the character of his features. He was unpleasantly disguised by blood and bruises and dirt, so that his own mother could not have recognized him. Dried blood matted his hair, one eye was closed, his nose would not do satisfactory duty as a nose until it received plastic attention from a doctor.

"I dunno if I know ye," Scattergood said. "I calc'late nobody'd claim acquaintance with ye on the strength of your looks. Live around here?"

"Fred—Norton," mumbled the man.

"W-al, I swan! Freddie Norton, eh? And who 'd 'a' thought it! Be you injured, or jest merely hurt? Better lemme help ye down to the water, so's we kin scrape ye off and see what's left. Kin ye make it?"

They did make it, between tugging and staggering and groaning, and Scattergood's red bandanna handkerchief soaked in the cool river water set about removing what accumulation of blood and dirt was thus to be cleansed away.

Freddie leaned down to drink, much like a blind puppy, while Scattergood clung to his shoulders to restrain him from falling in.

"One man never done it alone," Scattergood said. "It might 'a' been a pair of bears, or ye might 'a' been trompled by a herd of cows. Allus thought ye could take care of yourself, Freddie. Big enough, hain't ye, and soople enough? How many of 'em was the'—and what kind of critters?"

"Six," said Freddie. "Men. The Six Big Men."

SCATTERGOOD pinched his cheek and pursed his lips. "Ye hain't been a-foolin' around Half Acre, have ye? And what fur?"

"Help me into that buggy," Freddie said, in a tone Scattergood did not like. "I got to get home."

"What you got to git home for? Nobody's goin' to be glad to see ye—lookin' like that. You better have a errand some'eres for a week. What you want, to home?"

"My rifle," said Freddie.

"Um. . . . Dunno's I hold with rifles in sich circumstances. You might git mad and shoot at somebody."

"I calc'late to," said Freddie grimly. "I calc'late to get back to Half Acre and scrouge down in the bushes and get 'em, one by one!"

"Nobody never derived no credit from bushwhackin'," said Scattergood. "It's frowned on. . . . No; I don't calc'late I'll ride ye home to git you a bushwhackin' rifle. Thought ye had sense enough to keep away from Half Acre. 'Tain't no place for boys."

"Nor girls," said Freddie.

"Eh? Girls? What's girls got to do with it?"

"They ketched me talkin' to their sister."

"Seems as though they didn't favor it," said Scattergood. "Now, what does Lawyer Norton's son want, talkin' to a sister of the Six Big Men?"

"Her," Freddie said sententiously.

"I heard they had a sister, though I hain't never seen her. Is she as big as they be?"

"She's little and cunnin' and sweet," said Freddie; "and I'm goin' to get her away from 'em, or get killed tryin'."

"Don't seem as though a girl raised in Half Acre 'ud be interestin' to a decent boy, Freddie."

"She's not like the rest of 'em."

"They never are," Scattergood said. "Freddie, you don't know Half Acre like I know it. It hain't give the trouble these last few years that it used to. Not by a sight. Kind of confines its deviltry to itself, as you might say—or goes off to a distance. But it's bad, Freddie, clear through, as bad as the whisky it makes for itself, and as the drugs that it takes, and the blood that goes runnin' in its veins. It's a offscourin'. Folks that is too bad for any decent town to harbor 'em finds Half Acre is jest what they want. They're low, Freddie, awful low, and the' ain't no kind of evil they don't delight in. How come you to git acquainted with this girl?"

"I met her once when I was out huntin'—and we talked. And I met her again, and other times. She's dyin' there, Mr. Baines. It's killin' her; all that vileness around, and her so sweet."

"Must be kind of a miracle for a woman to keep sweet in Half Acre."

"Those brothers of hers watch her. They won't let anybody come near her. But she stands in mortal fear of 'em."

"Don't wonder at it none. And they ketched you a-talkin' with her?"

"Yes. We were arrangin' to get away."

"Now, I tell you what," said Scattergood, "you come along home with me and git yourself patched up some; and then you 'n' me'll talk this over. If I was you I wouldn't say much to your ma about no Half Acre girl. Seems as though it 'ud kind of upset her. Then, when you git washed up and stitched up and your eyes git open agin, you come around by the store, and we'll see. . . . Though I can't credit a good girl bein' in Half Acre."

SO SCATTERGOOD helped Freddie into the buggy and they drove on toward Coldriver, taking the back way into town and driving up the lane behind Lawyer Norton's house, so the young man could get in by the back door without being seen in his present condition.

Scattergood hitched his horse in front of his hardware store, and found very welcome the comfort of his specially reinforced arm chair on his piazza. There he tilted back, hat at his feet, and allowed his eyes to rove over as much of Coldriver as he could see from that vantage point.

He had been there a little more than an hour without moving, for there seemed to be little demand for hardware at that time of day, when a procession—what might justly be called a procession—came around the corner of the bank and crossed the bridge.

There was a semblance of military formation, and something of the business-like look of men marching to war. There were six men, six enormous men. Of them, the smallest stood four inches over six feet, and the largest six inches. As befitted men of their size and bulk, they were bearded, and the beards were black and bushy.

The six kept step as they swaggered along, two by two, and their bold, challenging, impudent eyes stared out of countenance all whom they met. Scattergood noted how they gave space to no one, and how inhabitants of the village gave way to them—even taking to the road to permit their free passage. . . . For these were the Six Big Men of Half Acre.

Half Acre! That hamlet of outcasts, lurking in its mountain valley! A hamlet of shanties, of slatternly women, of furtive-eyed men, of evil odors and of more evil ways. How many human beings clustered there not even the census man could tell with exactness, for the person whose duty it had been to enumerate was satisfied to submit facts and figures wholly apocryphal. Even by daylight he dared not venture into that warren.

How the village had originated few remembered; there were times when the godly forgot its very existence, for the Half Acrers kept to themselves, administered their own laws, and resented intrusion. There had been a day when, growing in numbers, they had played the part of bully in that part of the mountains; but that day was past. Scattergood had seen to that. Now, for half a dozen years, there had been a sort of treaty between Half Acre and the world which surrounded it. The world was to leave Half Acre to its devices, and Half Acre was to confine its deviltry to its own bounds.

And, of all the turbulent men of that place, the Six Big Men were most turbulent. Brothers they were, and co-rulers. Men of their hands, quick to passion and quicker to act. Their fame had spread, and they were at pains to keep it alive. . . . Now, as they approached, Scattergood studied them, and not without admiration, for he was able to appreciate a fine figure of a man, even if that figure were drawing wages from the devil.

The procession swaggered along, its very manner a taunt. Insolence rode upon its shoulders. It was an expedition. Scattergood recognized that. Not for years had the Six Big Men visited Coldriver in a body, and now that they came again it was with a purpose to be read in their eyes—the purpose to overawe.

In a moment they came abreast of Scattergood, who leaned back in his chair and cleared his throat.

"How be ye?" he asked.

The Six halted and faced him.

"Who wants to know?" demanded the largest.

"Pete Haddy, hain't ye?" Scattergood said. "These your brothers?"

"What if they be?"

"Fine-lookin' boys," said Scattergood. "Able-bodied and stout. . . . Um. Did ye come to taown for anythin' special?"

"What if we did?"

SCATTERGOOD leaned forward and nodded. "Now, Pete," he said genially, "you know you'll git as fur by bein' p'lite to me as by tryin' to raise my dander. I got a lot of patience, but I hain't got too much. Seems like you might remember me, Pete."

"I know ye well, Scattergood Baines."

"And so, time havin' passed along, you calc'late to come down here for a sort of a dare, eh? 'Tain't good jedgment, Pete."

"Aw, tell him to shet up, and come along," said one of the brothers.

"We're lookin' for a feller," said Pete. "We ketched him in the woods, makin' up to our sister. And we aim to ketch him again."

"And then?"

"He won't do no more tamperin' around in our part of the country."

Scattergood cleared his throat again. "I didn't know as you Half Acre folks was so strait-laced," he said. "Seems like I heard you was kind of loose in your dealin' with wimmin."

"Our sister's different."

"Um. Different, eh? Makes a sight of difference whose dog gits kicked, don't it? . . . W-al, boys, lemme say jest a word! You come swaggerin' down here, pushin' folks off'n the walk and what not. It hain't good jedgment. You folks hain't bothered us much of late—exceptin' for a stray chicken or a sheep or sich-like. And we don't calc'late to be bothered. So long's you mind your own affairs we don't calc'late to interfere."

"But if we don't, eh? What then?"

"Why," said Scattergood gently, "I'll git riled up, and then, fust thing you know, they won't be nothin' but ashes where Half Acre used to stand."

"Aw, sock him, Pete, and let's git along!"

"Kind of hot-headed, that young feller," said Scattergood. "Better git him home 'fore he does himself a harm. . . . And you better git too, Pete, and the rest of you. There's suthin' about your manners we don't take to here." He cocked his head. "Pete, what kind of a misapprehension was you laborin' under when you come blusterin' in here? Did ye think I was dead, or what?"

"We didn't care if you was dead or alive. We come to git that feller."

"Um. . . ." Scattergood drew out his watch. "This here timepiece says twenty minutes past five. I calc'late you drove down, eh? W-al, inside of ten minutes I want you should be on your way drivin' back."

"And if we hain't?"

"You will be," said Scattergood, "because licker hain't rotted away all your brains. . . . And keep to your half of the walk. Don't go crowdin' off folks that's got a better right than you. . . . Now, g'-by, boys. Don't make me remember that I'd forgot ye. Don't ye do it!"

Pete glowered, hesitated. Scattergood leaned back again in his chair. "G'-by, boys. . . . I'm kind of curious about that there sister of yourn, that you kep' so pure and sweet and pertected. I'd be more inclined to b'lieve in her if I was to see her."

"She's to home," said Pete, with narrowed eyes. "Some day when you feel able, jest drop in and call." He leered. "Some day when you feel able."

"If that's an invitation," said Scattergood placidly, "I dunno but what I accept it in the spirit it's offered in."

"What if we don't git out?" demanded one of the younger brothers belligerently. Scattergood pondered that a minute. Then he answered indirectly: "It kind of looks to me, boys, like Half Acre was gittin' too big for its britches." Suddenly he stood up. "Hey, Pliny," he called, "suppose you was to go and give a couple of yanks on the fire bell."

"Oh, we'll go," Pete Haddy said sullenly, "but we hain't promisin' not to come back."

"So I gathered," Scattergood said. "Pliny, you leave that fire bell alone. 'Twon't be necessary to-day."

"PLINY," said Scattergood, "I'm goin' callin' on a girl—at my time of life."

"Kind of ridic'lous, seems as though."

"You hain't got ary idee how ridic'lous it is," the old man said fervently. "A man hain't got much choice in this world how he makes a fool of himself. The's only about so many ways, and most of 'em has to do with wimmin."

Pliny Pickett pondered. He was not given to taking the initiative; collecting tickets on Scattergood's railroad was the passion of his life, and his one problem was guessing what his employer wanted him to do next. Now, he felt vaguely that Scattergood required some service; but he could not guess what it was.

"Either," Scattergood said, "a girl's good, or else she's bad, or else she's middlin'. Except when she's mixed of all three. A man kin git along with any of 'em, so long's he knows which set she falls into. The trouble's to find out. It don't matter what a woman is, she wants to be thought suthin' else. And whatever she is, you kin bet your bottom dollar she hain't what a feller in love with her thinks she is!"

"Seems as though," admitted Pliny. "I hain't studied wimmin in p'tic'lar."

"I've give a sight of time to it, and I've drawed a heap of conclusions—all of which is wrong in 'most any given case. Now, with men it's different. You take a case where the's ten chances to act sensible and jest one of makin' a fool of yourself, and a man'll unerrin'ly pick the one."

"I dunno's I jest foller ye to any practical end," said Pliny.

"THAT," said Scattergood, "is because the' hain't none. I've went and gone and let myself be drawed into suthin' all on account of a feller's bunged eye, and the bumptious set of another feller's shoulders, and a girl that most likely hain't so a-tall. Got my curiosity excited, that's what. If the Lord had of wanted it that there wouldn't be no trouble in the world he'd 'a' fixed it so wimmin couldn't excite curiosity."

"None of 'em ever excited mine," said Pliny.

"You ain't dead yit," said Scattergood. "Was you ever in Half Acre, Pliny? Eh? Ever visited around much there?"

"I calc'late you know better'n that."

"Um. . . . If you was to hear I was goin' there, what 'ud you do?"

"I'd figger you'd went crazy."

"'Tain't so improbable. Um. . . . And if you heard I'd gone there, say, about one o'clock this afternoon, and then found out I hadn't got back agin at six, like I said I was goin' to do—what?"

"I calc'late mebbe I'd ring the fire bell," said Pliny.

"Then what?"

"I calc'late the boys 'ud know what to do when they gathered," Pliny said, a trifle grimly.

"G'-by, Pliny," Scattergood said, dismissing him abruptly, as was his custom.

"G'-by, Scattergood," said Pliny.

"Jest a minute," Scattergood said. "Was you passin' Lawyer Norton's house?"

"I could."

"Would ye be apt to see young Freddie?"

"Seems as though."

"Anythin' special in mind to say to him, Pliny? Anythin' of a revealin' character?"

"I'd tell him you wanted to see him, Scattergood."

"Um. . . . Didn't say so, did I? W-al, about what time would you say I wanted to see him?"

"After six, seein's you won't be back till then."

Other People's Children, Dogs, And Radios

Personal conversation and a radio entertainment don't mix

By Virginia Terhune Van de Water

DRAWINGS BY
R. M. BRINKERHOFF

I LOVE children; I have three of my own. I am fond of dogs; I have one of my own. I have met radios; I have none of my own.

I believe that I keep an open mind with regard to all the above-mentioned articles. And, keeping an open mind, I try to see all sides of them.

Of course most parents are blinded by love, or are supposed to be. Yet I am sure that I detected my children's imperfections when they—the children—were small. Prudence and a sense of fitness forbid my suggesting that I observe any imperfections in them now that they are men. Years have taught me discretion. So, if you please, we will leave my own offspring out of the question.

Perhaps the fact that children are more of a rarity than they used to be accounts for the omnipresent propensities of those that now exist. I am not demanding that we return to the days of the once popular rule that children should be seen but not heard. All I ask is that they need not be both seen and heard all the time—especially heard.

To illustrate: I called on a friend who had urged me to come so that she might have a long, confidential talk with me. "I want," she said over the telephone, "to hear everything—what your plans are; how your work is progressing; in fact, I must have a heart-to-heart talk with you."

I had always liked Helen. She had been living in a distant city for the dozen years since her marriage. She, her husband, and her ten-year-old daughter had recently moved to New York.

She met me cordially and affectionately, and introduced her small girl to me.

"Dorothy, speak to this lady," she said.

Dorothy was sitting in a chair reading a book. She looked up for an instant.

"Hello!" she murmured, then returned to her book.

I think that the young have a right to their reticences, so, after asking the child a question or two, to which she responded only with a "Sure!" or a "No!" when prompted by her mother, I let her alone.

Not so the parent. We were hardly launched on our conversation before small Dorothy dropped her book and listened, wide-eyed. Her mother, noting this, smiled sympathetically.

"I was just speaking of this lady's work, my dear," she explained to the child.

"Does she work? What does she do?" the youngster asked briskly.

"She writes, dear." Then, to me: "By the way, what are you writing now?"

I never know what I am writing when asked. Moreover I have a "something" that makes me dislike most cordially to talk of my work. Some of us near-morons are hopelessly diffident in the presence of a superior and supercilious small girl. So I changed the subject to one less personal than myself.

AFTER a while my hostess mentioned a man who was a friend to us both.

"Tom dined with us the other night," she said. "I fancy he is drinking heavily. He looks it. Don't you think so?"

I glanced at the child. The mother saw the glance and interpreted it immediately.

"Oh, you need not hesitate to speak plainly in front of Dorothy. We have no secrets from her. It is so much wiser to be perfectly frank with children, you know. She saw Tom herself when he was here."

"He wasn't drunk—not much drunk," the child said gravely. "I liked him."

"Of course you did, dear," the parent smiled. Then, to me: "She is such a keen reader of human nature. She saw with her clear child-eyes the good that is in Tom in spite of all his weaknesses."

Again and again the little girl was included in our conversation. When she did not understand some reference, she asked, "What are you talking about?" or, "Who did that, Mother?" In every case the mother went into a detailed explanation.

I did not stay so long as I had expected to. The presence of a third person is sometimes a check to confidences between two old friends. And when the tertium quid is a small child who may repeat anything that is said, one's conversational ardor is automatically dampened. After a half-hour, when I arose to take my departure, my friend murmured a protest that sounded genuine:

"Oh, you are leaving so soon—why, you have not told me a thing about your private affairs! I wish you would not be so reticent about yourself."

NOW, the point I wish to make is that, while she may be willing to talk of her personal affairs in the presence of her small daughter, I am not willing to talk of mine. And I insist that if she wanted to have me confide in her she should have suggested that the little girl retire to her own room, or elsewhere, for a while.

"But you do not really love children, or you would not feel like that!" a mother reproves.

If loving children means that I want them present upon all occasions, then I must plead guilty to not loving them. Yet—I have always thought I was fond of them.

I have come to the conclusion that I did love them individually and as a class, until they were forced upon me. The fewer the children, the more they are talked about. And I have noticed that their bad manners increase as their numbers decrease.

Nor am I alone in this opinion. Recently a man told me that he was not going again to a certain house.

"I cannot stand their children," he declared. "I used to like children—at least the children of ten years ago. But I cannot stand them now that they are allowed to develop their own individuality at the expense of other people's comfort."

"I once thought I wanted children," one wife says. "But after spending a week-end with my cousin and her family I have reached the conclusion that there is no joy but calm. Those youngsters were up and storming about the house by daylight. And the parents never said a word against it."

Of course they did not. Parents don't say a word against many things now. Such statements as they do make their children contradict. Parents express opinions, and the children ask them how they get that way. If the child is father of the man, there are signs that the coming man is going to be a very disagreeable person.

I HAVE not touched on children as the fond parents' main topic of conversation. This phase of the subject might be discussed with more resentment than is becoming in one who loves her fellow man and woman. I try, as do numbers of other sufferers, to smile at what are termed the "wise cracks" of adored youngsters.

"And then," a mother says impressively, "Jackie said: 'Mother, isn't Daddy cross this morning?' Wasn't that clever? To think of his noticing and speaking of it so cunningly!"

There is some of the savage in even the most repressed of us. It may have been the savage in me that caused a faint and reminiscent tingling in the palm of my right hand. Perhaps I recalled what would have happened to me had I thus criticized one parent to the other; perhaps I was thinking what would have happened to one of my small boys had he said what young Jackie had said.

"He is really wonderfully clever and observant!" the proud parent sighs.

He was clever enough to mar a book which was the property of one of his mother's house-guests by drawing pictures all over the fly-leaves and margins. When the mother saw it she apologized laughingly, yet there was a ring of pride in the apology.

"I am sorry about your book, my dear. Of course the child ought not to have touched it—yet he has such a fondness for making pictures! And I actually believe he has real talent. Just look at the action in the legs of that horse he has drawn. Darling," to the small boy standing by, "say you are sorry you drew pictures in this pretty book, even if they are nice pictures."

"I'm not sorry!" the child muttered.

"Well, well, I am sorry you are not sorry," the mother soothed. "When you are older you will know better than you do now."

I sincerely hope he will.

I am aware that I seem intolerant in discussing other people's children. Yet my very intolerance is proof that I love the young of the species. If I did not, I would not mind seeing them spoiled and warped into ugliness. But I do not claim that my indignation is all altruistic. No—I may as well admit the truth that I am indignant because my own comfort is interfered with by the obstreperousness of other people's children.

I find it an effort to enjoy my dinner when a fox terrier belonging to my hostess is fed bits of food at the table at which we are all seated

OF COURSE love of my own comfort is also at the root of my protests with regard to other people's dogs.

Not all other people's dogs. I know some dog owners who regard dogs as dogs. And when I say that I am not belittling the canine. I have never had a stancher friend nor one as adoring and unselfish as my dog. His fidelity, his trust in me, his nobility, yes, even his sense of honor, are beyond words. But he is a dog, not a human being. And I resent it when people put a dog in the false position of behaving like a human being. Sometimes I find it uncomplimentary to the dog. I also consider it uncomplimentary to my own intelligence. One friend has told me of such remarkable performances on the part of her Airedale that, were I as big a fool as she seems to think, I would wonder that the estimable beast has never learned to read. According to her own statements he has done almost everything except vote.

Now, I insist that this is a positively unkind strain on the politeness of one's friends. To sit and smile and say, "Extraordinary!" at regular intervals takes quite a bit out of one. And even if one is as fond of dogs as I am, it is an acid test of one's politeness to have a big Airedale wipe his muddy feet on one's best white georgette gown. Having a rather squeamish stomach, I also find it an effort to enjoy my dinner when a fox terrier belonging to my hostess is fed bits of food at the table at which we are all seated. If he ate his food quietly it would not be so bad; but when he is given a bone and growls and slobbers over it while lying right near me—well, somehow my own food stops tasting good and I am inclined to stop eating it.

The steadiness of my stomach was put to the supreme test when a pretty young woman fed her Pekingese ice cream from her own plate and with the same spoon with which she was feeding herself. But I draw a veil over this scene.

Only—I who love dogs do wish that their owners would not prejudice people against them.

As I write, my Scotch terrier lies near me dreaming (perhaps) of chasing chipmunks or squirrels, his legs (Continued on page 190)

Sunset Pass

A strange and thrilling drama of frontier days

By ZANE GREY

Illustrated by W. H. D. Koerner

Synopsis of Preceding Instalment

MANY colorful adventures had come to Trueman Rock—cowboy, gunman, heart breaker—but none so wild and strange as that which befell when he came home to Wagontongue after six years' absence. He found many changes: The sheriff who had been on his trail, dead. The reason for the shooting which had made him a fugitive from justice, explained, and his name cleared. His one-time sweetheart, Amy, married to John Dabb, the richest cattleman in that country. His best friend, Sol Winter, broken in fortune, moved from his big, successful store into a dingy little one—and Sol Winter's son dead by the hand of Ash Preston.

And that was the beginning of a new life for True, a life that bound his fate inextricably with that of the strange, wild Prestons of Sunset Pass.

Newcomers to Wagontongue they were, but on the very day of True's return he heard rumors everywhere of cattle rustling, of the exploits of Ash Preston, of the mystery surrounding the whole Preston family, who had settled several years before in Sunset Pass. And on this same day he met Thiry Preston in Winter's store and lost his heart to her completely.

Before the day was over he had knocked down Ash Preston, who had insulted him in a drunken rage because he was with Thiry, had learned all that Winter knew about the Prestons, and had made up his mind to travel the sixty miles to Sunset Pass and get a job on Gage Preston's ranch. The trouble in Thiry's eyes had been plain to read, and he had resolved, no matter what came, to get to the bottom of her unhappiness, and to wipe that shadow from her lovely face.

He turned over to Winter the ten thousand dollars he had made in a lucky cattle deal in Texas, part of it to be put into the store, the rest to be kept for emergency, bought a magnificent white horse to suit the beautiful trappings he had brought with him from Mexico, and, in spite of Winter's warnings, set out for Sunset Pass.

IT WAS nearly noon the following day when Rock had his pack outfit ready for travel. Leslie came up presently with the white horse.

"Black leather an' silver trimmings," said the rancher admiringly. "Never seen him so dressed up. An' the son-of-a-gun is smart enough to know he looks grand."

"He's smart, all right," agreed Rock, with shining eyes. "Now we'll see if he'll hang me on the fence."

The white horse took Rock's mount easily, pranced and champed a little, and tossed his head.

"Jess, I'm sure surprised and plumb sorry to find you—your condition so—so different," began Rock, a little uncertain

"Good day and good luck, rancher," said Rock, lifting the halter of the pack animal off a post.

"Same to you, cowboy," replied Leslie heartily. "Reckon you don't need any advice about them hard nuts down in the Pass."

"Need it all right, but can't wait. When you see Sol, tell him I'm off fine and dandy," rejoined Rock.

With that he headed down the road which the Prestons had taken the preceding day. Before Rock was far out of town he had ascertained that his horse was a fast walker and had an easy trot. For speed and endurance, Leslie had committed himself to the claim that no horse in the country could approach him.

Several hours' ride out of the town, Rock reached the top of a long slope and there halted the horses to spend a few moments in reveling in the well-remembered country.

A thirty-mile gulf yawned wide and shallow, a yellow-green sea of desert grass and sage, which sloped into ridge on ridge of cedar and white grass. The length of the valley both east and west extended beyond the limit of vision, and here began the vast cattle range that made the town of Wagontongue possible.

THE valley smoked with the thick amber light of the warm June day. Lonely land! Rock's heart swelled. He was coming back to the valleys and hills that he now discovered he had loved.

An hour's ride down the slow incline brought Rock into a verdant swale of fifty acres, fresh with its varied shades of green, surrounding a pretty ranch-house. Here Adam Pringle had lived. If he were still there, he had verified his oft-repeated claims to Rock that here had been the making of a prosperous farm and cattle ranch.

The barn and corrals were closer to the road than the house. Rock saw a boy leading a horse, then a man at work under an open shed. Rock halloed. Whereupon, the farmer started out leisurely, then quickened his steps. It was Adam—stalwart, middle-aged, weatherbeaten settler.

"True Rock, or I'm a born sinner!" shouted Pringle.

"Howdy, Adam. How's the old-timer?" returned Rock.

"I knowed that hoss. An' I shore knowed you jest from the way you straddled him. How air you? This is plumb a surprise. Get down an' come in."

"Haven't time, Adam. I'm rustlin' along to make camp below. . . . Adam, you're lookin' good. I see you've made this homestead go."

"Never seen you look any better, if I remember. Thet's a hoss an' saddle you're ridin'. Whar you been?"

"Texas."

"Whar you goin'?"

"Sunset Pass."

"Cowboy, if you want work pile right off heah!"

"Thanks, Adam; but I've got a hankerin' for wilder country. I'll try Preston. Think he'll take me on?"

"Shore. If you'll stand long hours an' poor wages. But don't you ask him."

"Why not?"

"I'm advisin' you—not talkin'," returned the rancher, with a sharp gleam in his eye. "You know me, True."

"Used to, pretty well, Adam. And I'm sort of flustered at your advisin' me that way," replied Rock, keenly searching Adam Pringle's face.

"Stay away from Sunset Pass."

"Adam, I just never could take advice," drawled Rock. "Much obliged, though. How you doin'?"

"Been on my feet these two years," returned Pringle with satisfaction. "Got three thousand haid of stock. An' sellin' eight hundred haid this fall."

"Bully. I'm sure tickled. Losin' much stock?"

"Some. But not enough to rare aboot. Though I'm agreed with cattlemen who know the range thet there's more rustlin' than for some years past. Queer rustlin', too. You lose a few haid of steers, an' then you never hear of anyone seein' hide nor hair of them again."

"Nothin' queer about that, Adam. Rustled cattle are seldom seen again," returned Rock, for the sake of argument. But there was something unusual about it.

"Many new cattle men?" went on Rock.

"Not too many. The range is healthy an' improvin'."

"How's Jess Slagle? I used to ride for Jess, and want to see him."

"Humph. Didn't nobody tell you aboot Slagle? He couldn't make a go of his ranch in Sunset Pass after the Prestons come."

"Why not? It's sure big enough country for ten outfits."

"Wal, there's only one left, an' thet's Preston's. Ask Slagle!"

"I sure will. Is he still located in the Pass?"

"No. He's ten miles this side. Stone cabin. You'll remember it."

"If I do, that's no ranch for Jess Slagle. Marsh land, what there was of it fit to graze cattle, salty water, mostly rocks and cedars."

"Your memory's good, Rock. Drop in to see Slagle. An' don't miss callin' heah when you come out."

"Which you're thinkin' won't be so very long. Huh, Adam?"

"Wal, I'm not thinkin'; but if it was anyone else I'd give him three days—aboot," replied Pringle with a guffaw.

Rock's misgivings grew in proportion to the increasing warmth and pleasure of this ride toward old haunts. The fact that nothing was spoken openly detrimental to the Prestons was a singular feature that he had encountered once or twice before. The real Westerner, such as Leslie or Pringle, was a man of few words. This reticence sprang from a consciousness that he was not wholly free from blame himself, and that to be loose with the tongue entailed considerable risk.

Rock could not prevent his growing curiosity and interest, but he succeeded in inhibiting any suspicions. He wanted to believe that Thiry's people, including the redoubtable Ash, were the very salt of the earth.

Toward sundown he reached the south slope of the valley, and entered the zone of the cedars. These gray-sheathed trees, fragrant, with their massed green foliage and grotesque dead branches, seemed as much a part of a cowboy's life as grass or rocks or cactus. Rock halted for camp near a rugged little creek where clear water ran trickling over the stones. He went off the road and threw his pack into a clump of cedars where he could not readily be seen. How long since he had camped in the open, as in his earlier days on the range!

Then he unsaddled the white, hobbled both horses, and watched them thump out in search of grass. He unrolled his tarp under a low-branching cedar and opened his pack, conscious of pleasurable sensations. It had been years since he had done this sort of thing.

He was on his way before sunrise the next morning, and about noon he halted before the stone cabin that he knew must belong to his old friend and employer, Jess Slagle. Rock rode into what was a sorry excuse for a yard, where fences were down and dilapidated wagons, long out of use, stood around amid a litter of stones and wood. The corral in the back was a makeshift, and the log barn would have shamed a poor homesteader. It amazed and shocked Rock, though he had seen many cattlemen start well and never finish.

Dismounting, Rock went to the door and knocked. He heard steps inside. The door opened half a foot to disclose a red-haired, homely woman in dirty garb, more like a sack than a dress.

"Does Jess Slagle live here?" asked Rock.

"Yes; he's out 'round the barn somewheres," she replied, with a swift flash of beady eyes that took him in.

As Rock thanked her and turned away he saw that she was barefooted. So Jess Slagle had come to squalor and poverty. Who was the woman? Rock certainly had no remembrance of her. Presently he heard the sound of hammer or ax blows on wood; and he came upon Slagle at work on a pen beside the barn.

"Howdy, Rock. I knew you were in town. Range Preston rode by this morning an' passed the news."

"You're right, Miss Preston," returned Rock, ruefully. "Your brother was not—well, quite taken with my visit"

This gaunt man was Slagle, changed vastly, no doubt like his fortunes. He showed no surprise or gladness. The grasp of his hand was rough, hard, but lacked warmth or response. Rock remembered him as a heavy, florid Westerner, with clear eyes, breezy manner, smooth of face, and without a gray hair.

"Jess, I'm sure surprised and plumb sorry to find you—your condition so—so different," began Rock, a little uncertain.

"Reckon that's natural. Not much like when you rode for me, years ago," replied Slagle, with the bitterness of the defeated.

"What happened, Jess? How'd you lose out?" (Continued on page 191)

He Gets His Fun by Taking Boys to Alaska

© C. M. HAYES & CO., DETROIT

George E. Buchanan, Detroit coal dealer, takes boys on trips to Alaska and pays a third of each one's expenses, provided the boy's parents pay a third, and the boy himself earns the other third. (Above) A group of youngsters on one of the yearly trips

GEORGE E. BUCHANAN is Scotch, wealthy and a bachelor. His hobby is boys. He believes that travel is necessary to education, and each year he sponsors a trip to Alaska for boys. Last year seventy-two boys went "On to Alaska with Buchanan."

He has gathered dollars, many of them, and invested and multiplied them. But he has gathered boys, and encouraged them, and instilled into their young hearts fine ideals, appreciation of clean pleasure, and the ambition to work and grow.

He was born in a log house near Thamesville, Ontario, in 1869. When his father died the mother had the care of eight boys and one daughter. George, fourth eldest of the children, had to stop school and work on the farm to help support the large family. But while he worked on the farm, he dreamed of far-off places. He was young and he had no money; but he had a friend, an old Irish ship-builder named Alec Elliot. Old Alec was a seaman, and it was to Alec that George took his dreams.

The old Irishman sympathized with the eager boy. He told him wonderful tales of foreign places, and offered to lend him one third of the price of a trip, if his mother was willing to have him go.

George's mother encouraged her son's ambition. That night, after the other children were in bed, she and George talked of how he could make enough money to go abroad. His mother said she could spare an amount equal to that Alec Elliot had offered, and George could use it as a working capital.

The next day he began to buy up underfed sheep from shiftless farmers. He kept up his regular home work, but also did odd jobs wherever he found them. He helped the blacksmith at his forge, and ran errands for Alec Elliot. Every penny he could make went for food for his half-starved sheep. At last came the day when he traveled with a double-deck carload of fat, healthy sheep to sell in the Buffalo market.

"The money I made on that sheep deal satisfied Alec Elliot. My mother had already loaned me one third. I had earned a third, and Alec now loaned me the other third. I was ready to go to Ireland. I chose Ireland because my mother had a friend there who had agreed to let me stay in her house if I would work on her farm without pay.

"I traveled first class as an investment in education; but it was expensive, and I had to walk from Arcolo to the farm in Wicklow County.

"As I trudged over those miles all I could think of was that Mother had said her friend owned enough cows to give seven barrels of buttermilk in a day. I forgot that I was realizing my ambition to travel and learn and see. All I could think of was cool, fresh buttermilk, and before I reached the farmhouse I felt as though I could drink the whole day's output of seven barrels.

"My mother's friend made me welcome, but she did not mention food. All afternoon we sat in the big kitchen, and I answered her questions about my mother, my trip, the United States and Canada. I was so hungry I could not keep my eyes off a huge mound of potatoes in the corner. When at last I was given a knife and told to peel potatoes and drop them into a great iron kettle on the fire, I wanted to shout with relief.

"When the men came in off the farm, the Irish woman placed upon the table onions, butter, and two enormous pitchers of buttermilk. Then she drained the steaming potatoes, and there followed the best meal I have ever eaten in my life.

"I got back home and soon afterward went to live in the United States. I found work immediately, and with what I could save I bought wood and sold it. When I had accumulated eight hundred dollars, I started a little fuel yard, with one horse and an old wagon for deliveries. I sent for one brother and later another to join me in this country. I paid Alec Elliot—but not all I owed him, because I can never pay him for having trusted me with that loan. I can never pay him for establishing within me a sense of financial responsibility. But in grateful memory of his belief in me, I trust the boys who work for me."

s much as seven or eight thousand dollars day. Even the office boys have access o the cash, and he has never lost a cent y theft.

Buchanan says he was past middle age efore he realized what the first trip had eant to him; but from that realization ame the "On to Alaska with Buchanan" roject. He refuses to have the trips ppear in the light of philanthropy. "It is elfish," he insists, "because I love boys."

His plan is based on Old Alec's offer o him when he was a boy: Each boy must arn for himself one third of the cost of he trip, the parents must pay one third, nd Mr. Buchanan pays one third.

"I supply each boy with one hundred nd twenty-five dollars, and I tell him hat he may pay it back some day—not o me, but to the fund for other boys to o to Alaska. I do not ask that they sign a note or obligate themselves in any way."

"Then how do you know they will pay it back?" I persisted.

"Because I just believe they will."

Sometimes a boy wants to go, and the parents say no. Then Mr. Buchanan tells the boy that he cannot take him without the consent of his parents; but he advises him to go to work, to save his money, to learn all he can about Alaska and its history, and adds that perhaps when these things are done his parents will give their consent and help. When the parents see their son working after school hours instead of running the streets; putting his pennies, nickels, dimes, and quarters into the bank instead of into candy and movies; studying geography and history, because he wants to do so, those parents are pretty sure to be convinced that thrift, ambition, and education for their son is cheap for one hundred and twenty-five dollars.

"How do you maintain discipline?" I asked.

"There is no need for discipline," he replied.

"And what do you get out of it?"

His lips twitched and his eyes twinkled. "You think because I am Scotch that I've got to be paid. Well, that works both ways. The Scotch also pay—full measure." Then his eyes took on a far-away look and the deep lines in his face softened. "As I look back on my life I see that all I have ever had I owe to someone's helping me. I help boys."

Boys from all over Canada and the United States may go along, and there are no religious or nationality restrictions. On the 1926 trip, boys from places as widely separated as Florida, Connecticut, Saskatchewan, Nova Scotia, and Carolina went together to Alaska.

They are taught to buy their railroad tickets, make Pullman and ship reservations, manage their baggage and laundry, handle certificates of deposit checks which draw four per cent interest, and conduct themselves with dignity and self-confidence in public places.

MRS. HARRY F. WEBBER

Mrs. Neill is Boss of a Planing Mill

IN HER seventy-third year, Mrs. Rachel Neill is still boss of her own planing mill in Orange, New Jersey. And not just a letterhead boss, either. Every morning for the past thirty-five years has found her the first to open the mill door and every evening the last to shut it. Mrs. Neill looks as though she would be more at home in a blue-checkered apron, trimming the edges of an apple pie than in this place of sawdust, shavings, and noisy machinery. But when you talk to her in the little mill office the apple pie fades out of the picture.

"How did I do it?" Mrs. Neill smiled as she straightened the blue prints on her desk. "How did Lindy get to Paris? He figured it out for himself, and just got up and at it. And that's what I had to do."

When she was thirty-eight years of age Mrs. Neill faced the world with five children to support. Her husband owned a planing mill. This was the only business she knew anything about, and all she knew had been gathered from scanty conversations at home.

Not very inspiring, for the mill had been failing for two years! But during this time Mrs. Neill had pieced together her own opinions about the business. She decided it was her logical means of support and, having decided, she went to work.

There were plenty of people to tell her what a ridiculous idea it was, and how impossible it would be for an inexperienced woman to cope with the details of a mill. But that didn't bother her. She had too many other things to keep her busy. There were forty-odd men employed in the mill at that time, and you can imagine how they welcomed a "Petticoat Boss." Not only that, but one who admitted she knew nothing about the business!

"The first big thing to decide was what to do with the children," she said. "How could I look after them and the business at the same time? I could have boarded them out; but I am a strong believer in families sticking together. Our home was some distance from the factory, and I knew being two places at once was more than I could manage. The factory couldn't be moved, so I moved the family. I set the men to work in a hurry building a small cottage just as close to the mill as possible. We weren't long in getting settled, and I had the comfortable feeling that, while I still had my worries, at least they were all under one roof! The change made my housework easier, and I had more time to study in the evening."

PHOTOGRAPH BY PARK STUDIO, ORANGE, N. J.

In addition to taking over the management of her husband's planing mill, Mrs. Rachel Neill has raised a family of five children. She is seventy-three now and is still boss at the mill

Mrs. Neill spent the next few months working with the men. To this day you are apt to find her in a flower-sprigged apron running through a choice piece of oak with a ripsaw or bossing some important job in the gluing department. Perhaps her sincerity in tackling even the lowliest jobs in the shop put her on a solid basis with the men. It was not long before she understood every piece of machinery. She says the biggest thing she had to learn was how much she didn't know.

Every business has its own peculiar problems and at first they were baffling, even to a woman who was determined to learn. What does the average home-keeper know about markets, the comparative strength of woods, how weather affects them, which wood is best stained, which painted?

"I'd never say I didn't know or couldn't do a thing," confessed Mrs. Neill. "I would take all the papers over to the cottage and just study it out until I did know.

I spent weeks learning to read architects' specifications and blue prints."

It was not easy work for a woman to learn the complicated ways of profitable bidding on contracts. It was a job in itself to be able to recognize a good buy of timber.

"In those days it never occurred to me that I would fail. I had worked so hard it just seemed natural to finish my first year with a fair profit on the books. From that time the business improved steadily. It has never been what you might call a 'get-rich-quick scheme,' but it has made it possible for me to raise and educate my children, and enjoy them as well!"

After thirty-five years of strenuous work, Mrs. Neill is still at the head of her business, although her two sons are now her assistants.

ESTHER MELBOURNE KNOX

The Theatrical Stars in Their Courses Have Been Good to Peter

AT a desk high up in the Empire Theatre building in New York City, from nine to six every working day, sits a colored man with a gentle, sensitive face, and a voice that matches his face as voices rarely do. His name is Peter Mason, and for thirty-three years his job has brought him into constant contact with the great and the near-great of Broadway.

Among other duties, at present he has charge of the clipping books in which are pasted press notices of Empire stars and productions. But Peter has served his theatre in many capacities. Beginning as water boy when he was ten years old, he has been in turn office boy, call boy, watchdog, custodian of manuscripts, and general factotum.

Actors, playwrights, producers —Peter knows them all. He has seen stars risesuddenly, twinkle for a few months or a few seasons along the horizon of the Great White Way, and then sink back forever into oblivion. Years ago, he watched in walk-on parts awkward beginners whose names now glitter in electric lights as regularly as the theatrical season swings around. It is the pride of his gentle heart that he can count among his friends such personages as the late Charles Frohman, veteran producer and owner of the Empire Theatre; Augustus Thomas, the dean of American playwrights; and such stars of the stage as John Drew, Ethel Barrymore, Jane Cowl, and Maude Adams.

On the wall of the room in which he works hangs a signed photograph of Miss Adams as the immortal Lady Babbie in Barrie's never-to-be-forgotten play, "The Little Minister." Locked up in Peter's head is the actress's New York address and telephone number. Since she quit the stage, about ten years ago, Miss Adams has lived a secluded life, avoiding all possible contact with the outside world. The Empire Theatre is still her business address. All mail that comes to her there is by her request entrusted to Peter, who takes it home with him, redirects it, and sends it to its final destination.

"People often ask me," said Peter, "how the stars act behind the scenes or off the stage. That's a question I like to answer. Mostly they behave just as you would expect great men and women to do. As a rule, the higher up they go, the kinder, and more thoughtful and generous they are. I believe stage folks are the biggest-hearted people in the world anyway. But perhaps that isn't a fair thing to say, for they are the only people I know very well and they have been such wonderful friends to me.

"I have never been very strong. A good many years ago when the doctor said my lungs were threatened, Miss Maude Adams heard about it. She knew that I didn't have the money to go away. Most of my savings had gone to pay the doctors. And what did Miss Adams do? She sent me to Colorado for three months, with all my expenses paid.

PHOTOGRAPH BY D. JAY CULVER

Peter Mason has worked at the Empire Theatre for thirty-three years—ever since he got a job there at the age of ten. He has known Maude Adams, John Drew, Charles Frohman, and many other notables of the stage

"Another one of my good friends was Mr. John Drew, the veteran actor who died a few months ago. I always think of Mr. Drew as the perfect gentleman. I never saw him lose his temper or even his patience.

"I remember when Miss Ethel Barrymore, as a tall, thin slip of a girl, used to come to the Empire to watch her famous uncle rehearse. The boys, Mr. Lionel and Mr. John, used to come too. Few people realize how talented a family the Barrymores are outside their great gift for acting. Miss Ethel plays and sings extremely well. Mr. Lionel is also a skillful musician. Mr. John is a very clever cartoonist. Mr. Frohman used to say that the Barrymore children took to the stage like so many young ducks to the water.

"Speaking of Mr. Frohman, he was the best loser I have ever seen. Many a morning after a bad opening night that showed he stood to lose hundreds or thousands of dollars on a production, he would come in bright and early, whistling and swinging his cane just as cheerily as ever.

"Mr. Frohman sent me away several times for my health, and every time he got a chance he gave me a little better job, or a little more money in my pay envelope. I fairly worshiped him; but I wasn't the only one. He was one of the best-loved men in the theatrical business."

Peter first came to the Empire when he was about ten years old. For the first few months, he worked as "water boy," passing water to the patrons of the theatre between acts. Then big Alf Hayman, manager for Frohman, noticed the alert little colored boy, who seemed to know by instinct just where the thirsty ones sat. Peter was promoted to the anteroom outside of Mr. Frohman's private office. Here his energy and eagerness to please attracted the attention of Mr. Frohman himself and Peter was taken into the producer's stronghold as general utility boy. He rapidly made himself indispensable, taking on more and more responsibility as he grew older. At the time of Mr. Frohman's death, ten years ago, Peter was in charge of his private office. Anybody waiting to get to Mr. Frohman had first to get past Peter.

As I said in the beginning, Peter has an exceptionally nice speaking voice. I might have added that his diction would do credit to a college graduate.

"Born on Fortieth Street, a few blocks from what is now Times Square, I was just a common little Broadway tough when I came to the Empire," he told me. "However, deep down in my heart I burned with the desire to make something of myself. The first thing I noticed was that all the people I admired most had soft voices, and that they expressed themselves well. In my feeble way, I tried to talk like them."

Peter shook his head a little sadly.

"I ought to do much, much better," he said wistfully. "Remember, I have lived among the stars for thirty-three years!"

Professor Heckler's Trained Fleas Are the Whole Show

"GIDDAP, Napoleon!" "Yea, Marc Antony!" "Come on, Cæsar!"

An excited crowd cheered the animals on, and the tiny golden carts rattled merrily across the strip of white blotting paper. The first act in the flea circus was under way.

There were five successive acts: Professor William Heckler opened his pretty inlaid boxes, dipped in his pincers, and lifted the fleas out by leashes attached to their metal collars. During the performance, he talked to them gently and persuasively. "Easy, there, Reuben! No, Paddy—the other way. Back into the box, Peaches—remember what I told you." And, amazingly enough, these actual, live fleas jumped when they were told to jump, came when the professor called them.

PIEMONTE STUDIO, N. Y.

Professor Heckler putting his trained fleas through their paces before an interested gathering. For twenty years the professor has been giving performances of his flea circus at fairs and expositions all over the country

Prince Henry juggled a ball, lying on his back. Two fleas kicked a "football" back and forth. Paddy, the Irish flea, carried a green flag, turned 'round twice, and jumped through a hoop. Rudolph made a merry-go-round revolve briskly, and several fleas, dressed in ballet skirts of rose and green and yellow, stood on their hind legs and danced to the tune of a music box. That was all; and would you please leave fifteen cents with the lady at the door, as the flea circus was an extra attraction.

Two fleas pulling lever that will fire off cannon

Professor Heckler was born in Switzerland. As a child, he traveled into Germany, and it was there that he first saw performing fleas.

He came to this country when he was eighteen. At that time he made delicate machinery for a living. He used to amuse himself by fashioning boats through the necks of bottles. "It taught me patience," he says, "and delicacy of touch."

But he had always wanted to own a troupe of fleas, and one day, about twenty years ago, he saw his chance. He met a man who claimed to be an expert flea trainer—all he needed, he said, was a backer.

Professor Heckler was willing to be that backer, so they went into business. They posted the town of Jacksonville, Florida, with billboards, and hired a show place. They collected some likely-looking fleas. Then it was that Mr. Heckler discovered the man in whom he had put all his confidence to be wholly ignorant on the subject of flea training.

"That's how I got into the business," Heckler explained. "I just had to jump in and train those fleas myself. You never know what you can do till you try."

The professor's first flea circus, given twenty years ago, was, he says, a pretty crude affair. He managed, somehow, to get collars around the necks of his fleas. He got them harnessed up to carts, but he didn't have them really trained.

"They were always trying to escape," he said, "and a lot of them did. I used to hang onto their leashes like grim death. Now, as you saw, I don't have to watch my fleas, or hold on to them, because they don't want to escape. I have won their confidence."

A flea in the process of being trained

Professor Heckler knows several sailors who keep him supplied with fleas, for they are usually plentiful on shipboard. The female flea is far easier to train than the male. She is not only more docile, but also larger and stronger. "Most of these you saw today are females," he told me, "though I have given a lot of them men's names—that's for purposes of showmanship.

"The first thing I do when I get a fresh batch of fleas is to put them into a bottle, and expose the top of the bottle to a strong light. Fleas don't like heat; but it's their instinct to keep on jumping. Well, most of them will keep right on jumping up into the light; but a few will learn to stay down in the bottom of the bottle, where it's cool. Those few have got gumption. They've passed their first intelligence test.

"I put collars on those fleas, and harness them up to a little spring, to watch the way they jump. That's how I judge what they're best suited for. It's my business to suit their jobs to their temperaments, so as to get the most out of every flea.

"Different? They're as different as human beings. They don't even look, let alone act, alike. Now, my star performer"—and he patted the tiny mother-of-pearl box that housed Prince Henry—"he's like all geniuses, he's temperamental. Sometimes he goes through his act without a hitch. Then again he'll be as stubborn as a balky mule."

It takes the professor about two weeks to get one of his fleas into form. During this time, the flea is handled constantly, rewarded for good behavior by being fed —the professor feeds his charges with blood from his own right arm.

It is the flea's nature to jump, and one of these tiny insects, weighing half a grain, can jump three or four feet. But weighted down with a car, the flea learns to walk. And gradually it learns to jump only when it is given the signal to do so.

At the end of two weeks, an ordinarily intelligent flea is ready to step before the footlights and make its bow to the public. In the meantime, understudies are being trained to step into its place, for trained fleas don't usually last more than three or four months. "They die in harness," the professor observed.

They are kept in little boxes, their feet entangled in cotton. The whole troupe can be packed away into a small satchel, and often is, for Professor Heckler has exhibited his fleas in expositions and fairs, from New York to California. For the past two years he has been with Hubert's Museum. He's seen a lot of humans, but he prefers fleas.

"I know I have to think for my fleas," he says. "When they do wrong, I figure it's because they don't know any better. But when humans don't use their brains, it's their own fault."

DORIS MONTAGUE

Out of the Frying Pan Into the Lily Pond

IN a series of greasy, smelly waterfront kitchens, R. C. Byers spent thirty years cooking, for a weekly pittance. He did it because it was the work he had turned to when a lad; but while he worked over a red-hot stove, his dreams were of the country, chaste water lilies, and a quiet pool.

Then, at the age of fifty, this man, once a cook, but now a water-lily specialist of the Pacific West, and the possessor of a fortune drawn from the gold hearts of lilies, spent all his savings, two hundred and seventy dollars, for an acre of land on Haller Lake, a few miles north of Seattle, Washington.

At first, he kept on making clam chowder and frying salmon steak in a small Seattle waterfront restaurant, all the while working at his little logged-off land tract that was one quarter marshy lake front. All his free hours went to removing the stark stumps—draining the lake beach. Today, the one acre has grown to a five-acre ranch, and he has standing offers of twenty-five thousand dollars for the place.

Finally, a picturesque log house was built close to the lake front, and the erstwhile cook left his pots and pans and started to carry out his water-lily dream in earnest.

"When I bought my original acre," Mr. Byers said, "there were muskrats in the lake. Now, these rats fed on the water lilies, and I wanted to make a business of raising the lilies. So I trapped the muskrats and sold their hides, and I used the revenue from the hides to buy my first water lily plants at ten dollars a dozen. You know, if it hadn't been for those muskrats, I don't know how I would have got the money for the lilies. As it is, the hides have paid for the lilies, and the lilies have paid for the place."

Mr. Byers began by using a quiet bay-like indentation of the lake as a lily pool; but now his rarer types and his favorites are kept in a concrete display pool 178 by 70 feet and in a 600-foot trench which winds gently away from the lake front.

As the lilies have to be kept free of pests and insects, Mr. Byers has stocked this trench with imported French frogs, trout, and bass. The water in the trench is constantly changed from the lake, and the concrete pool is flushed by turning in lake water so that it overflows. The submerged root stocks of the lilies thus have the fresh water that is vital to them and the placid atmosphere that is likewise so necessary.

A revenue running into thousands yearly is derived from the sale of water-lily plants, as the original stock develops very rapidly. As well as supplying plants to nurserymen, horticultural stores, and individuals on the Pacific coast, this grower ships to Texas, to New York, to practically every state in the Union. During the blooming season he cuts fifteen to twenty dozens daily. He has a loving regard for them all, but a half-dozen types are his especial favorites. He lingers over Mrs. Richmond, a rainbow-tinted bloom that appears from April to November. Then there is the garnet-colored "Attraction," plants which he purchased two years ago for fifteen dollars each. These plants have brought ten times their purchase price in the two years. Exquisitely scented "Rose Arey" and "Eugenia de Land" are also regarded with especial pride. The gloriously blue "Bluebird," a tender lily with thirteen-inch flowers, he nurses along in a hotbed.

R. C. Byers raises over fifty kinds of water lilies on his five-acre farm north of Seattle, Washington. He supplies nurserymen and florists all through the country

"Cold winters make no difference to the water lilies—just cover them with plenty of water, and leave them in the pool or lake;" he says. "That's all they need. In a concrete pool, such as I use for display purposes, the plants thrive best with a foot of soil and a foot of water. Really, lilies just grow themselves. Soil should be changed every two or three years."

Mr. Byers declares that the roof of an apartment house or office building is a fine place to raise the beautiful blooms. A concrete pool could be built, and the same principles which govern his concrete display pool followed. As well as the day-blooming lilies, there are exquisite types which unfold their beauty at dusk and remain open until the morning sun. Gorgeous are these night bloomers, ranging in hue from glistening white to deepest crimson. "Lotus," "Dean," "Juno," and "Devon" are favorites with Mr. Byers.

Lilies reward with bloom a month or six weeks after planting, and each plant yields more stocks each year. That is why this prolific lily garden, occupying a mere quarter of the original acre, has paid for the entire ranch, placed it all under cultivation, bought an automobile, and brought in a substantial income besides.

There are five hundred cherry trees on the Byers place, and last year Mr. Byers sold twelve tons of cherries. Except at cherry-picking time, he still does all of his own work.

I looked at the blush-pink lily which he had given me, while I wondered how to put a question. He answered it before I got a chance to ask:

"Yes, I'm nearly seventy years old," he said. "But a fellow can't grow really old, you know—not raising flowers."

Women know that everybody enjoys this soup!

The Campbell's way I'm here to say
Is easy as can be.
It's quickly done, now comes the fun—
Just leave the rest to me!

What a comforting thought that is! To be sure that the meal will begin with a soup which puts everybody in a happy mood!

For Campbell's Tomato Soup is without a rival in popularity. Its sunny, enlivening flavor gives an instant sparkle to the appetite.

"Captured Sunshine" might well be another name for it. Pure tonic tomato juices. Luscious tomato "meat". Strained to a smooth puree, enriched with golden butter, seasoned as only Campbell's French chefs can do it. What a delight to the taste! 12 cents a can.

Add an equal quantity of water, bring to a boil, simmer a few minutes. For a Cream of Tomato Soup follow simple directions on label.

Your grocer has, or will get for you, any of the 21 Campbell's Soups listed on the label.

22 or 45 is there an age when women must cease to look young?

Among the greatest enemies of health and vitality are decayed teeth and infected gums. Every year they cause thousands of cases of ill-health and premature old age, as well as dangerous diseases, physicians tell us. And, of course, no one really begins to grow old until health begins to fade.

Dentists state that the most serious of dental troubles start at The Danger Line—where teeth and gums meet. The rounded edges of the gums form tiny V-shaped crevices there. Food particles collect in these crevices. They ferment, forming acids that cause decay and irritate the gums.

A dentifrice should do more than clean the exposed surfaces of the teeth. But it is almost impossible to clean between the teeth or in the V-shaped crevices where acids form. A dentifrice should protect these remote places against decay by neutralizing the acids that form in them. Dentists long have recognized that Milk of Magnesia is the most effective of all products for neutralizing mouth acids. Squibb's Dental Cream contains more than 50 per cent of this safe, pleasant antacid—enough to neutralize the mouth acids. Used regularly, it will prevent decay. It reduces the peril of Pyorrhea, relieves sensitive teeth and sore gums. It helps to keep the entire mouth in a healthy condition.

Safeguard that precious health now. Prevent the many serious troubles that arise from neglect or the wrong methods of protecting your teeth. Just remember—the acids at The Danger Line must be neutralized—and Squibb's Dental Cream accomplishes this safely, pleasantly and effectively. No wonder this dentifrice has become one of the largest selling dental creams in the world. At druggists everywhere—40 cents a large tube, for beauty's sake.

The Shiner-Up

to do it little by little, but I think it should be done at once. It"—she paused as though to think of a charitable word—"it needs a bit of freshening up."

That night, for the first time in his twenty-six years, Harrison Westlake knew what spring housecleaning really was. Up to that time his various dwelling places had been rendered immaculate by unseen methods. This time he was a party to it.

"If you could just shake the larger rugs, I can attend to the other things," the new maid said hesitantly. "I'm sorry. They're too heavy for me."

"I should say so! Of course I'll shake them."

"Out at the back door—and not till dark, you know. Then no one will see."

Through the evening, with window shades tightly drawn, the outer office underwent changes. Down came the window curtains, which were put to soak in the kitchen tub. Up came the rugs. With sure, deft strokes of broom and brush the dust came off the walls and the yellowish woodwork was white again. The floor shone under the smart application of a flannel cloth. Chairs and tables took on a luster from a bottle of polish found in the kitchen—left by the last residents of the cottage.

The doctor, standing awkwardly about, holding the teetery step-ladder, or laying the rugs, found himself full of admiring wonder.

"She's certainly some little shiner-up!" he told Harriet on one of his trips upstairs. "Why, by George, that's just what I'll call her! She doesn't seem keen on giving us her first name. Said we could use her last one."

THE tiny inner office, upon which he had been guilty of his only extravagances, was rendered still more white. And at last everything was done.

"The windows have to be left till daylight; but I'll do them early and have the curtains up by noon," the Shiner-Up said gravely, as she started with a load of buckets and brooms to the kitchen. "Thank you for your help, Doctor Westlake. And what time will you wish your breakfast? At eight?"

"Yes, but—just a moment. I want to tell you how much I appreciate all you've done tonight. It's mighty good of you to do all this when you should have been sleeping. I—"

It seemed as though the small figure drew itself up a little.

"That's quite all right. I shall tidy up the rest of the house as soon as I can. Good night, sir."

It had the tone of a dismissal. "Funny little piece, that," the doctor thought to himself as he went up the stairs; "but heaven-sent if anything ever was."

He went to sleep with the curious feeling of relief from an intolerable load.

The next morning at breakfast, the Shiner-Up, looking very fresh and rosy, stood again respectfully beside her employer.

"I was just thinking, sir, if I were you, I should start off in the car every morning after breakfast, and drive about the town until nearly noon. It would have a good effect upon the neighbors, sir, to see you going out and coming in—as though you were very busy, sir! Women will gossip to each other, you know."

"You bet they will," the doctor laughed. Then he looked serious. "Your idea's pretty good. Thank you, I'll try it!"

When he came back at noon after circling the town he stared in amazement at his own house. Even to the least observant eye it presented a subtly different look. The windows shone clear in the sunshine, and behind them hung curtains of an incredible whiteness and crispness.

But it was upon the doorway that the doctor's eyes remained riveted. The old iron-colored knocker and door handle had apparently been replaced by ones of new and shining brass. So had the bell. But that was not all. At the side, as if upon an escutcheon of pure gold gleamed the words:

Harrison Westlake, M. D.

They stood out in bold brilliance to hit the eye of every passer.

"Well, I'm a son of a gun!" the doctor muttered reverently.

ONCE inside, Harriet gave him the details.

"She worked nearly all morning on that knocker and door latch. I told her they were only iron, but she was convinced they were brass. When she had everything done she came flying up to tell me how fine it looked. She's too good to be real, Harrison! There's something queer about the whole thing. She says that well-polished brasses on a doctor's office are bound to bring patients."

"Not such bad psychology at that when you come to think of it!" returned her brother. And as he went down-stairs he was humming jubilantly:

"He polished up the door-knob so faithful-lee
That now he's the ruler of the King's na-vee."

The Shiner-Up received his praise demurely, and then made a further shy suggestion:

"I was thinking it might be well, sir, if you would let the car stand out in front during your office hours. It would look rather businesslike. And you could start right off again at four o'clock for another drive."

She hesitated, turned very pink, and then added, "And, if I may suggest it, sir, I should walk out hurriedly if I were you, and start off as quickly as possible. It all has its effect upon people, you know."

For three days, under the gentle suggestions of the Shiner-Up, the doctor went striding out of the house with his satchel every morning and every afternoon, dashing off as fast as the car could achieve a start. For three afternoons he sat at his desk in the immaculate white coat she had insisted upon washing, and read up feverishly on obscure diseases. This too had been suggested.

"It's a wonderful opportunity for study, sir, if you should care to," she had intimated timidly.

Then as he entered the house on the fourth day at noon, the Shiner-Up met him with eyes very bright.

"A patient called up this morning, sir, and asked for an appointment. I told her you couldn't possibly see her today, but—"

"What?" shouted the doctor in a terrible voice. "You told her I couldn't see her?"

"Yes," went on the Shiner-Up calmly, though her cheeks were flushed. "I said your time today was all planned for—it is you know—and I told her I could give her an appointment for tomorrow, but she said she was going to a bridge luncheon. Then she asked if you had office hours on Saturday, and I said you had for the especial convenience of business men—I just thought of that at the moment, but it would be an excellent idea. So I told her she could come Saturday at three."

The doctor stared at her with his brows drawn, aghast.

"But why, under heaven, didn't you let her come today?" His voice was still formidable.

"Well, you see she'll be determined to come now. And at the luncheon tomorrow she'll tell all the ladies how wonderful you must be, since you're so busy. I know from her conversation that she talks a good deal. I told her she should make appointments to see you several days ahead." The Shiner-Up suddenly drooped a little. "I hope I did right," she said rather pathetically.

The doctor was not mollified. "Well, it would not have been exactly my idea. If anyone else calls, please say that I'll see them at once."

"Very well, sir," she said quietly.

But up in Harriet's room the doctor found he had still more to learn of feminine psychology. He told the story, and waited for Harriet's wrath to be added to his own. Instead, that discerning lady lay back upon her pillows and laughed till the tears came.

"Why, Harrison, that's the richest thing I ever heard! But she's right! Absolutely. That's the neatest stroke of advertising among the women of Riverview that could have been done. The trouble with both of us is we wouldn't have had the courage to do it, but she had! Really, she's marvelous!"

THE doctor went down to lunch in a chastened spirit, but all his apologetic overtures were repulsed gently. He spent his office hours calling himself a beast for the way he had shouted at her, and wondering what Saturday would bring.

As a matter of fact it brought, first of all, some new suggestions from the Shiner-Up.

"I was just thinking, sir," she said seriously, "when the lady comes, you could be in the inner office. I will show her into the outer office and close the door into the hall. We had better keep her waiting at least ten minutes. Then I'll open the door of the little office into the hall, and then bang the front door as though another patient were leaving. Before she can look out the window I will be in, announcing that you will see her. Don't you think it would be well to do it that way?"

"I suppose so, Shiner-Up. Your ideas seem to have the weight of the majority behind them. I want you to know, though, that if I didn't really feel I could make good I wouldn't want to use any silly pretenses of any kind. But I respect my own ability—and all I want is a chance to prove it. Real worth-while work! I know I have skill!"

The doctor spoke impressively and looked, as he uttered these sentiments, very earnest and noble—and very young.

The Shiner-Up nodded respectfully. "Yes, sir, of course."

And just then the bell rang.

THE Shiner-Up pushed the doctor unceremoniously into his inner office, straightened her cap at the hall mirror with hands—it must be admitted—that shook a little from excitement, and then opened the door and, with a superb blending of dignity and gracious deference, showed the expected patient into the outer office and closed its door.

After a five-minutes wait in the hall, she peeped in at the doctor.

"You might scrape your chair a little, or move about," she whispered softly, and withdrew her head.

At the end of another five minutes two doors banged and the meeting of the patient and the doctor was at last achieved.

That evening at dinner, the doctor, in great spirits over the success of his afternoon, looked suddenly at the Shiner-Up as she served his dessert.

"Why don't you ever smile?" he demanded suddenly.

Her face grew a shade more prim.

"One does not smile at one's employer," she said with finality.

"Oh, doesn't one? One would think one might with impunity if one were very careful about one's kind of smiles!"

And then something happened. Under the doctor's very eyes the plain little face of the Shiner-Up underwent a transformation. It seemed to crinkle uncertainly for a second, and then laughter swept over it; and with the laughter, a piquant beauty, a charm, a coquettish appeal seemed to dance upon it. The doctor saw for the first time the sweetly parted white teeth, the blue eyes all roguish with fun, and an exquisite, alluring dimple in each cheek—and he forgot himself.

"Why," he muttered rather insanely, "why, I never knew you had dimples!"

The Shiner-Up drew herself up to her full sixty-one inches and regained her gravity at once.

"I use them only occasionally," she retorted, and disappeared into the kitchen.

That night, for the first time since her arrival, the doctor seemed loath to discuss the latest doings of the Shiner-Up with Harriet.

During the next weeks three important changes came about in the white shingle cottage: First of all, Harriet came downstairs and took her old place as mistress of the house; and, second, to the utter amazement of the doctor, patients began to come; calls increased. Before he knew it, he was reasonably busy and his spirits soared when he won his first hard battle. He knew then that his belief in himself was not idle vanity. In May there came a day, gloated over by the Shiner-Up, when there was no need of subterfuges. The office hours were filled.

But the third change was in the doctor himself, although, as he fondly believed, there were no outward and visible signs of it.

Day after day he felt a sweet new toxin creeping through his blood. It caused him to sing with joyous abandon as he prepared for breakfast each morning; to beam upon everyone he met on the street, to drive the car at a breakneck pace to get home again from his rounds. It caused him to haunt the kitchen and the back porch upon the smallest and feeblest excuse. Night after night, when the house was still, he would sit at the office window looking out into the starry spring darkness in a mood of vague enchantment. Then he would fall to scribbling on his prescription pad. Although the intended poem never got beyond the first lines there was a great variety of these:

> Oh, presence, gentle and serene,
> With calm and quiet spirit blessed,

and,

> Oh, eyes so wise, so sweet, so blue!

were among the many initial stanzas that adorned the professional tablet for a moment, and then in tiny bits were deposited in the waste basket.

ALTHOUGH his general skill as a diagnostician was growing more apparent each day, the doctor was slow in admitting the truth about himself. But at last he had to. He, Harrison Westlake, whose taste in girls had always been considered rather super-nice; who had led college proms with the belles of the hour; who was supposed to have left everywhere behind him, these later years, a trail of adoring feminine hearts; he, whose acquaintance with ultra-smart flappers and highly sophisticated beauties had been long and varied, now found himself in love with the maid! With the Shiner-Up!

Oh, it was true. This strange, deep longing to look upon her face whenever he was away from her; this burden of tenderness; this quiet bliss as of having at last "come home" whenever he was near her; these shuddering bits of delight when her small hand accidentally touched his as she tidied his desk or served him at table—all this told him it was no mere infatuation such as he had known before. It was love. As new in all its phases of revelation as though he had up to that moment never heard of it.

He was reminded at every hour of the day of her services. His cuffs were not frayed now. They had all been miraculously turned. His home was a place of order and shining comfort. Even the frowsy little pines under the front windows had been made neat and symmetrical by the patient manipulation of the big kitchen shears upon them. A bed of flowers was planted along the fence. In all weathers, the brasses on the front door shone to glistening. Appetizing food was placed before him. And, most marvelous of all, patients adorned his office! For all of it he was indebted to the Shiner-Up.

Harriet herself seemed a new person. She was gaining in strength and in housewifely knowledge at the same time. The Shiner-Up had relaxed noticeably since her mistress had come down-stairs. Her small, prim face was often smiling now. And sometimes the doctor heard, as he was coming in, a faint ripple of music which he knew was her laughter; but though he always rushed to see again the magic of it on her face, the Shiner-Up invariably received him with a serious demureness by the time he got there.

He was, in fact, baffled at every turn as the days passed, not only by the girl herself but by certain well-worn old words that kept rising combatively to the surface of his mind: Family and Convention and Career, were the most annoying.

The oil portraits of stern, handsome men and proud women that furnished the up-stairs living-room along with some ancestral mahogany pieces that Harriet would not part with, all remonstrated with him, too, from their heavy gilt frames. He could hear them saying that no Westlake had ever married beneath him.

And while he was fighting with all the strength of the new aching tenderness in his breast against these reproachful warnings, the roses began to bloom, skies grew bluer, and the nights more sweet with honeysuckle—and it was June.

One night the doctor started up from a sound sleep with the sound of crashing glass and grinding brakes, and a man's shout. He flung on his clothes and went out. Two cars had catapulted into each other just in front of his driveway. Two men from one car were already on their feet when he got there, shakily telling each other how it happened. The man in the other car was much too silent about everything. The doctor did most of the work of extrication. In the faint moonlight he was able to satisfy himself that the young fellow he had brought out was not killed, but was stunned from a bad head cut.

"I'm a doctor," he told the others. "Can you two help him in if I go ahead and get things ready?"

"Sure we can carry him," one of the men assured him; "but don't ask us to do anything when we get in. Me, I'm kinda sick already!"

The doctor ran up the walk and made a few quick businesslike preparations in the office. Then he went up the stairs two at a time and knocked on the Shiner-Up's door.

"Can you help me in the office right away? A man's been hurt. Come as fast as you can," he called softly, and was back to receive his patient.

AT ONCE he became absorbed in his work. It was a nasty cut, and it was necessary to work skillfully and quickly. He was hardly conscious of the Shiner-Up's entrance. He only knew that the articles he needed as he worked were ready at his hand, and all his brusque commands obeyed promptly.

Meanwhile, the others had telephoned to an address they found in the young man's pocket, so that by the time the doctor had finished his work and given his patient a stiff dose to bolster him up, another car was at the door, and the young chap was able to be helped into it by all hands, and sent home.

The doctor walked slowly back to the house, thinking now only of the girl. She had been plucky! She could do anything, it seemed. But when he reached the

1,000 Men Told Us

What men wanted in shaving cream. Now, before you buy, try what we've made for you—at our expense—for 10 days

GENTLEMEN:

Politicians know what to expect nationally when an election goes one way or another in the comparatively small state of Maine. And so, in merchandising, experience teaches that the opinion of 1000 men reflects the average viewpoint of millions.

So, when we decided to create a shaving cream, we asked 1000 men what they sought in shaving comfort and efficiency. Then we set out to meet their requirements.

They told us four things. We gave them five. Now we ask the courtesy of a test—based solely on merit—to prove to yourself the shaving delights we have discovered for you.

Just mail the coupon for a free 10-day test

Our laboratories for 65 years have specialized in fine soap products. One of our toilet soaps is a leader of the world. Others are used in countless homes and institutions everywhere.

With the four objectives we had set, we started our experiments. Time after time we got a fine shaving cream result, yet one or another of the things we sought was missing.

Finally, after the 129th experiment, success came. It was enthusiastically received by men everywhere. Today it is outstandingly the fastest selling shaving cream on the market.

These 5 important factors

1. Multiplies itself in lather 250 times.
2. Softens the beard in one minute.
3. Maintains its creamy fullness for 10 minutes on the face.
4. Strong bubbles hold the hairs erect for cutting.
5. Fine after-effects due to palm and olive oil content.

Now make the trial, please

No doubt your present shaving preparation suits you, yet there may be a better way. We've tried to find one for you, and will thank you to give it a test. Just send the coupon now, before you forget.

office door he smothered a cry. For there, drooping over a chair was the Shiner-Up, in a queer, inert little heap. Her long taffy braids hung childishly at either side of her white face. Her eyes were closed.

"If I'm not the prize brute," the doctor groaned as he picked her up bodily and strode through the house to the back porch. There, in the cool night air, he laid her down and set about mechanically doing the right things to revive her. But even as he worked, the physician was lost in the lover. For as she lay there, so little and helpless and white, he knew at last that the faces in the oil portraits had no more dominion over him. He was a free man and in love. No matter who she was, it was this girl out of all the world that he desired for his own.

WHEN the Shiner-Up opened her blue eyes, she looked wildly at him for a moment, then she smiled and tried to sit up.

"How silly of me!" she cried. "I must have fainted just as you came in. I'm all right now. My head is quite clear."

"Drink this," said the doctor, supporting her.

And then, because his arm was already about her and because he loved her so, and the air was full of roses and honeysuckle, the doctor went a little mad. He drew her close.

"Sweetheart," he breathed. "I love you! Haven't you seen it? Ever since you came. I can't do without you. My precious girl! I love you!"

The Shiner-Up struggled free. She got up unsteadily to her feet. The doctor rose too and stood on the step below her, looking eagerly up. But the girl's face was crimson now instead of white, and it was soon apparent that the red was that of anger.

"How dare you!" she burst out. "How dare you say you love me! I'll tell you what you love. You love your comfort. That's what it is! You were in hard luck when I came. Now things are going well. I cook your food and darn your socks, and wait upon you! And because I've become necessary to your comfort, you call it love! Well, it's not. You don't know what love is! And don't you touch me again!"

She turned to flee, but the doctor was too quick for her. He too had a crimson face. In all his life, he had never met with so violent and so unexpected a rebuff.

"I'll show you whether I know what love is," he said through his teeth. He caught her and held her in his arms.

"You've got to listen! I've never asked a girl before to marry me. I ask you now. I tell you I love you! If you don't believe me—well, here's this!"

And he kissed her hard on the lips.

"Oh," cried the Shiner-Up, with a little moan. She tried to pull herself away. "You ought to be ashamed! All you handsome collar-advertisement men think you can make love to any girl in the moonlight! Well, you can't to me!" She struck at his broad chest, while suddenly the tears ran down her cheeks. "Let me go. I—just—hate you!"

He released her then and she disappeared. He heard the stairs creak faintly and her door close above. Then he sank down on the steps with his head in his hands. He had never felt such a hurt. A collar advertisement! So that was what she thought of him. Why had he been so boldly confident that she would love him? What was there about him for any woman to love, when you thought about it! He wallowed in bitterness.

Then, as he still sat on gazing into the darkness, he began to curse himself again for a brute and a fool. Why had he bothered the girl now, of all times! After all she had just been through! Had he no chivalry, no self-control, no common sense? No; it seemed he had not. He sank lower in his despair, and did not leave the porch till nearly daybreak.

The next morning at breakfast the doctor and the Shiner-Up did not meet each other's eyes. Harrison told his sister about the accident, and then left on his morning rounds.

When he entered the door again at noon, Harriet met him with tearful excitement.

"Harrison," she cried, "she's gone!"

"Who?" said the doctor dully, though of course he knew.

"The Shiner-Up!" said Harriet, and went on to explain.

The girl had merely said that she had received some word that caused her anxiety and must leave at once. She had taken the eleven-o'clock train, refusing her week's pay.

"Did she—leave any message for me?" the doctor asked huskily.

"She said to say good-by to you. That was all."

"No address?"

"None."

"I see," said the doctor inanely. And he went into the office and shut the door.

For two weeks the doctor went his way, doing his work conscientiously, staying out as long as he could, because he hated to go home. A small daughter of Ethiopia now kept the brasses clean and served him at table. There was really no diminution in his physical comfort, for Harriet had learned much from her teacher; but oh, the unendurable ache in his heart! He lay awake nights making wild, foolish plans for finding her. He lay awake because the deep hunger of his love would not let him sleep.

On the day when he did not eat, Harriet knew that something must be done. She left him at the table, went into the office and wrote a few lines on his desk pad, then went for a walk. When the doctor went in later, he found this:

I can't bear to see you suffer so. She asked me not to give you her address. I won't; but if you look in the upper drawer of my bureau—left-hand side—you'll find it. H.

THREE leaps up the stairs. A whirlwind in Harriet's neat drawer. The paper in his hand! He read: Violet Landis, Dowling Institute, Dept. of Home Economics . . .

The street and number blurred before his eyes; but New York was clear. Only an hour away. He dashed down the stairs, left a message with the maid, did some rapid telephoning, and was off.

"Violet," he kept repeating to himself. "Her name would be Violet! It's perfect!"

At the institute he waited, puzzled, in the wide entrance hall. It seemed elaborate for an employment agency. Miss Landis was in a class just then, the girl at the desk informed him at last.

"In a class?" he repeated mystified.

"Yeah, students are, sometimes, you know," the girl said pertly.

He sank into a chair, dazed. Students! Classes! Just then a dapper young gentleman entered the hall and sauntered up to the desk. He leaned upon it and beamed at the young lady. The doctor forgot him for several moments, then came back to him with a jerk.

"And if you'll help me get an interview with the Landis girl," he was saying, "say, kid, I'll do anything for you. I want the scoop! I just got the tip today, and I beat it right over. She's the only heir to the late J. T. Landis's fortune, I know that. You see, it would make a front-page story: Young Heiress Serves as Maid! Great stuff, if I can get all the details. How soon do you think I can see her?"

"That man there asked first," the girl stated reluctantly, seeing the doctor's eyes upon her.

Then the doctor rose and came forward.

"I think," he said in a low voice, "that you will find it useless to wait. There isn't going to be any scoop for anybody. I'm not from a newspaper. I'm a—friend, and I know Miss Landis has nothing to say for publication. I'll walk with you to the door."

And he steadily propelled the reporter thither. After a glance at the doctor's set chin and general dimensions, the other stopped sputtering, and went.

The doctor stood still a moment as the door closed. He would get his hat and go home. There was nothing to wait for now. He saw everything clearly. The whole thing had evidently been a combination of school experiment and lark. The wonder was that he had not guessed something like it from the beginning.

His face grew hot with shame. Why had he ever invented such a silly name for her as Shiner-Up? Why had he done any of the foolish things he had been guilty of? It must all be a joke to her now, even his love-making. He felt sick at heart.

HE TURNED sharply on his heel and stood face to face with the girl herself. The chic little frock which she wore with an accustomed air, the sheer silk stockings and smart pumps represented the wealthy Miss Landis. But the small heart-shaped face with its frame of yellow braids was still that of the Shiner-Up.

"Miss Landis?" the doctor inquired stiffly.

She nodded, flushing a little, then motioned toward a small reception-room on the right. "If you will come in here we can talk," she said.

The doctor went in and Miss Landis closed the door. The doctor spoke with an effort. His face looked drawn.

"I have just discovered the truth about you, quite accidentally as I waited here. I—I want to apologize for everything, and—say good-by."

"Was that what you came for?" There was a hint of dimples.

The doctor shook his head.

"Why not tell me your real errand," she suggested. Her voice was very soft.

"You know without my telling you what it was, and you know, too, why everything is different now. I want to thank you again for all you did for us—it's beyond words of course—and to say good-by."

He held out his hand but she did not take it. Instead, she spoke with a humorous tenderness:

Let the gift be worthy of the "best girl" you ever had

Mother's Day, Sunday, May 13th

This is the world-famous Sampler specially wrapped for Mother's Day giving.

Whitman's Sampler

The Sampler is expressive of the qualities that most appeal to mothers. Inner character and goodness. Outward charm and refinement. A gentle whisper from bygone days in the quaintness of its "dress". Yet thoroughly modern in the variety of its sweets and the skill with which they are made.

Yes, genuine things are most acceptable to Mother. And she will recognize in the Sampler your desire to express a real affection.

Many will prefer to give the Sampler in its special Mother's Day wrap, with Lincoln's famous tribute, or other appropriate sentiments, cross-stitched in the design. The Whitman Agency near you—probably the leading drug store—will attend to all details of mailing or delivery for you.

We Offer Men

a faster, smoother shave this new Small-Bubble Way

Ordinary Lather

Photomicrograph of ordinary lather surrounding single hair. Note how the large bubbles hold air instead of water against the beard.

Colgate Lather

Under identical conditions note the closely knit texture of Colgate lather. The small bubbles hold water instead of air against your beard.

"There's really no mystery to it, sir! This 'small-bubble' shave cream certainly makes it easy for your razor."

BEARD stubborn . . . skin tender? Forget it, men! Here's a quick new way to get whiskers off clean and smooth, without razor-pull, sting or smart. See unique offer in coupon below.

Can you imagine a shave that leaves your face smooth as velvet? A shave that keeps your skin fresh and invigorated . . . delightfully clean and cool? A shave that stops razor-pull, drag and scrape?

It's a shave with a smile . . . glorious comfort from start to finish.

Small Bubbles . . . that's the theory of it. A brand-new principle of shaving that soaks whiskers soft in a hurry.

Already millions have adopted it. Thousands now buy it daily.

But we want you to try it, too.

So we're offering a test that any man can make with unique results. See coupon below.

Small bubbles did it

No other shaving cream is like Colgate's.

It is, we believe, the ultimate attainment in the science of beard-softening. A shaving cream based on the now proven principle that water, and not soap. is the real softener of your beard.

Thus Colgate lather is designed to absorb more water . . . to scientifically drench your beard with moisture right at the base, where the razor work is done.

It's a "small-bubble" lather. For small bubbles hold more water. They carry it closer to the base of your beard.

You'll say, "Good-by, Razor-Pull"

The minute you lather up with Colgate's, two things happen:

1. The soap in the lather breaks up the oil film that covers each hair . . . floats it quickly away.

2. Then billions of tiny, moisture-laden bubbles seep down through your beard . . . crowd around each whisker . . . soak it soft with water.

Instantly your beard gets moist and pliable . . . softened right down at the base.

Thus your whiskers come off clean and smooth.

No razor-pull. No stinging and smarting. Twice-over shaves aren't needed now. Your face feels clean, fresh, smooth, invigorated.

Clip that coupon before you forget.

We will also send a trial bottle of Colgate's "After Shave." It's a new lotion which is making friends every day.

Just jot your name and address on the coupon . . . and leave the rest to us.

SEVEN WONDERFUL SHAVES...FREE...If you're willing to judge Colgate's on its merits...we'll cheerfully pay for the test. Mail coupon.

"But I thought a doctor always took the history of the case before he pronounced a final verdict?"

"So he does," the doctor stammered, "if it's really his case."

The girl's eyes dropped.

"I think then you had better hear mine. I suppose you ran into a reporter here. I've been warding them off for a week. It is true, as he probably told you, that my father was J. T. Landis. But that doesn't tell all about me."

SHE hesitated, then went on steadily: "My father and mother were very unhappy together. So for years I lived six months of the time in a little New England village with my mother's people, and I learned to cook and to keep house in the most thorough-going fashion, and the other six months I lived in my father's big city home and was a different sort of person. You see?

"When I was at last left alone, I felt I couldn't stay idle. I wanted some sort of career. I came to Dowling. The New England part of me, you see, always came out on top!

"This spring one of our deans told us that a student could get her last term's credits by doing practical research in some field. So I shocked them by deciding to answer an ad for a maid. I thought it would be fun, quite an adventure, and, besides, I was hungry to crawl into a real home again on any pretext. I meant to be most scientific and professional, though—study the domestic problem and all that, and then write articles about it."

The girl's face grew suddenly scarlet. Her voice dropped.

"But when I got the wrong telephone number—and finally got to your house—that first afternoon when I saw you trying so hard to hang up those tea-towels—I—I loved you, Harrison!"

His name on her lips sent a tremor through him.

"You—what?" he breathed.

The girl went on bravely.

"I loved you. I know it now. Then I refused to believe it. And the night you told me—I struggled, because I hated to surrender. And because I wasn't sure of you. You see, I haven't seen much happiness between men and women, and I decided never to let myself believe a man, or to fall in love. I was always going to be free and independent."

"But now—?" the doctor whispered.

"You've won," she said simply, and held out her hands to him.

A little later he grew daring.

"Violet," he begged. "I love that name! Why can't we be married right away, today? What is there to wait for, sweetheart?"

She was serious a moment, and then she raised sweet eyes.

"Nothing, I suppose, since it's unconditional surrender."

"Then I'll telegraph Harriet, and tell her I'm taking a day off and—"

"Oh," Violet cried with a little ripple of laughter, "let me show you just what you must say to her."

She turned to the desk and wrote swiftly:

"Have made a permanent contract with the Shiner-Up. Expect us both home on Thursday."

WHAT CHRYSLER GIVES NO OTHER CAR APPROACHES

WHEN a product like Chrysler leaps into prominence almost overnight and continues growing in public favor month after month and year after year, it must offer unique qualities and values.

The fact is, people are recognizing more and more how Chrysler engineering and manufacturing constantly show the way, how refinements and improvements for the very finest Chryslers are passed on, through the principle of Standardized Quality, to the Chryslers of lesser price.

The way that Chrysler sales keep climbing, always climbing—from 27th to 3rd place in 42 months — reflects the realization of motor car buyers that Chrysler manufacturing and engineering offer quality and value in every price field—from $670 to $3495 — that no other car approaches.

Great New Chrysler "62"—Seven body styles, $1065 to $1235. Illustrious New Chrysler "72"—Seven body styles, $1545 to $1795. New 112 h. p. Chrysler Imperial "80"—Fourteen custom body styles by Chrysler, Dietrich, Locke and LeBaron, $2795 upwards. New Chrysler "52"—Seven body styles, $670 to $790.

She can't Tell you all she sees..

—when it comes to half-clean faces!

SOME things she has mentioned... his curly hair, his clean white teeth, and how well he looks in evening clothes.

But she can't tell him that her sharp woman's eyes have discovered what his mirror didn't—the pore-dirt that hides in every face.

The air about you, according to the scientific study made by the U.S. Weather Bureau, is alive with millions of tiny specks of dust and soot. Too small to see, these particles float onto your face. Cling to the skin. Work into the pores. Get jammed under the skin.

Surface washing can't budge pore-dirt! These photos show that. And they show one other thing, too—that Pompeian Massage Cream rolls every gray speck free!

Rolls out pore-dirt that washing never reaches

Photo Number One, taken under the lens of a microscope, shows a section of skin before this pink cream was rubbed in. See for yourself the dirt in the pores.

Now look at picture Number Two. Some difference! Notice those dark marks—dried pellets of cream gray with pore-dirt that just a few minutes' massage rolled out.

1. Photomicrograph taken under lens of powerful microscope showing section of skin before using Pompeian Massage Cream.

2. Photomicrograph of skin after using Pompeian. Compare the skin tone. Note the dried pellets of cream, dark with pore-dirt that has been rolled free.

Remember, all the surface washings in a blue moon wouldn't have removed that dirt. But now—there's skin really clean!

Try Pompeian today. Give yourself a brisk two-minute massage.

Pompeian not only spruces you up with a gloriously clean feeling but sets you on your way with a complexion as glowing as a man just back from a long vacation.

Let this FREE test convince you

"Boys, We Had Him Wrong!"

books, not usually war books, to the social gatherings he has always liked in moderation; but he has not given up work. The blade is not rusting in the scabbard. It still flashes, for there are still fights to fight.

"I've always got a lot out of life," he says, "and got along all right that way—keeping busy."

Has it agreed with him? An Irish sergeant used to say, "I needn't ask—only look at you!" The picture of health, straight-backed, square-shouldered, he belies sixty-eight strenuous years, because through those years he has disciplined himself. He is going strong, yet if ever a man has earned a rest, that man is John J. Pershing. He started working when he was thirteen, and has been at it ever since.

Work was needed to graduate from the early school that has educated so many other famous Americans—the farm and the small town. The Pershings were people of character and intelligence, and later, of substance; but not during John's boyhood. Outside Laclede, beside the railroad track, is a sign: "This is the birthplace of General Pershing." On September 13th, 1860, his father was bossing a railroad gang, and in a section house that stood there first arose the voice that two million men were to obey. A year later the family took a farm near Laclede, where John remained almost until he entered West Point.

That that event was foreshadowed when the General of the Armies was but five years old is scarcely known. For four years of Civil War, Missouri had been at the cross-roads of North and South, East and West. Northern troops were continually passing through Laclede, or garrisoned there. One of the first things John Pershing saw as a baby was his country's uniform; one of the first things he did as a boy was to put it on. Dressed in a "soldier suit" his mother had cut down, the youngster mingled with the admired grown-up soldiers, went to their commissary and "drew rations," bacon, coffee, and hard-tack, to be borne home to his mother.

THERE were nine Pershing children, and father and mother would have had their hands full even if their pockets had been, too. They had the real pioneer spirit. They worked hard, and sent the children to school; but as soon as John got big enough and old enough, thirteen, he went to work on the farm when he wasn't at school. But he liked it, "had a good time at it." The fences were post-and-rail of oak logs split into rails; good, stiff exercise. John did about everything on the farm. He got up and drove out to the fields when the stars were still shining sometimes, "dropped corn," as they called it, and bound wheat and ran the mowing machine.

"I did a lot of work around horses too."

The General had been smiling more and more broadly as he talked. Now he chuckled one of his chuckles that seem to go 'way down into the midriff.

"And you know, afterward, in the cav-

..this Sundstrand operator did not make a single error

MEN shouted, "Add 1242 and 371 and 9642. Now subtract 9347. Multiply by 81." The answer? 154,548. They read it themselves—then they checked it by hand. It was always right.

There she sat for six whole days . . . the noise of a convention around her.

Any numbers, any combinations—this operator did not make a single error, even though she could not see the keys. Why? Because Sundstrand has a marvelously simple keyboard—only ten numeral keys.

So simple that the touch system is natural. So simple that errors are few. So simple that a good operator can figure almost as fast as you can talk.

One hand controls all operations. Every figure is printed on a tape in plain sight. Direct subtraction—which means no complements to figure—is as simple and speedy as addition. Just touch the subtract key and write. Automatic-shift multiplication is just as easy. Sundstrand does half your thinking and all your work.

Nor are Sundstrands expensive. They cost as little as $100. A request brings you Sundstrand's fully illustrated descriptive booklet on the complete line of adding, subtracting and calculating machines and cash registers. All with the ten-key keyboard. Use the coupon.

alry out West, any difficulty I got into, it helped me to get out of. That work with horses, wagons, and harness, that farm work, gives assurance. It teaches you to do things. I believe it's the best preparation a boy could have for life. I had a real home when I was a boy, and we were a big family, and a happy one. We had good times, hunting, sometimes on horses, bareback, with an old muzzle-loader and powder horn, for ducks, quail, rabbits, or squirrels. But we earned good times by doing real work every day."

And the General became very earnest.

"I like to see anyone work up and make good by character and ability," he said, "so that he stands out on his own worth. A great many men who came to the front in the war were self-made."

"But to go back to early days—my memory has just got going—my first journeys out into the world were to the Linn County Fair at Linneus, six miles north of us, and once, when I was twelve, I helped drive a flock of sheep into Iowa. Once my father took me up to Brunswick, in Chariton County, to look at some land, and I saw the Missouri River in flood, eating at its banks, carrying off houses, and frightening people."

HE HAD been going to school and studying evenings, and when he was seventeen he began to teach a negro school at Laclede. He cut and split the firewood, but, again, liked the exercise. The fine new building is called "Pershing School." In October, 1879, the General went to Prairie Mound to teach, and got forty dollars a month for it, and the next year he went to Kirksville Normal, hoping to save money to gratify his boyhood ambition—to become a lawyer.

"Yes; I wanted to be a lawyer," he said, explaining, "and my family wanted me to. The law then was considered the ladder of success. Lincoln, my boyhood ideal, had been a lawyer. I have always liked preciseness, exactness, and the study of law seemed to gratify that. Before I was twenty, I had read all of Blackstone and all Kent's Commentaries. Our friends knew about my fondness for law, and one loaned me books and helped me—old Abe Mullin in Linneus, the best lawyer in Linn County and just as good a lawyer as you'll find anywhere."

He borrowed books from another friend, Doctor Spurgeon, of Laclede, whose boy planned to become a doctor, as John Pershing did a judge.

In the spring of 1882, he saw an announcement in a newspaper that competitive examinations for appointment to West Point from Missouri would be held in two weeks' time. That changed the whole course of his life.

"Perhaps but for it I might be wearing a black gown today, and be a judge," the General said.

He got up and walked quickly to the window, then back.

A while before, he had been offered an appointment to Annapolis by Congressman Hyde, a friend of his father, but the navy did not interest him. He went home and talked this new opportunity over with the family. His father was willing, but his mother didn't like the idea. Her war memories were not child memories like his. But his sister, Mary Elizabeth, said she would help, and he went to work.

"A clean exhilarating feeling . . unlike any other dentifrice" writes Norman Black of Milwaukee, Wis.

Gentlemen:

I have been using Pebeco daily since 1915. At that time my teeth had gotten in such poor condition that it was necessary for me to have a great deal of dental work done. It seemed that there were small cavities continually appearing and the gums would bleed very easily.

After various experiments I found Pebeco to be the very best and finest dentifrice on the market. As soon as I started to use Pebeco, I became aware of the exhilarating and clean feeling it left in the mouth, absolutely unlike any other dentifrice. I noticed tobacco stains soon disappeared and my teeth became much whiter, in fact a very glossy white, and after massaging the gums with Pebeco night and morning the bleeding ceased. I have not had a cavity in my teeth nor any trouble with the gums in all these twelve years.

I am, therefore, very enthusiastic about your product and cannot recommend it too highly.

Leaves a good clean taste . . keeps teeth sound and white

LIKE A PLUNGE in a mountain pool, the refreshing tang of Pebeco brings a tingle of health and cleanliness to your mouth.

Pebeco's honest, virile flavor comes from its special salt, placed in its formula by a famous physician to stimulate the mouth fluids which are the real guardians of the teeth. They disarm the acids that cause tooth decay, softening of the gums, unpleasant breath. But while we are still young these mouth fluids diminish and our teeth begin to deteriorate.

At the first taste of Pebeco, and for hours after the morning brushing, your mouth feels young and fresh. You smile and talk without self-consciousness. The bedtime brushing gives protection while you sleep.

Dermutation does it!

There's a smooth, fresh finish and feel to the Mennen shave that's immediately noticeable and gratifying to you. It's dermutation that does it, dermutation that softens the toughest, horniest beard that grows, leveling the skin peaks around the hairs, so your razor cuts the beard square, clean and even at the skin surface. No nicking. No scraping. None of that irritating drag, that yanking at the hair roots so painful when the razor balks at a partially softened beard.

No caustic to burn or smart. And Mennen works equally well in water hot or cold, hard or soft. Five soothing emollients tone up the face, leaving it comfortable and smooth for hours to come.

And be sure to top off with Mennen Talcum for Men—soothing and comfy—stops face shine, yet doesn't show. The Mennen Company, Newark, N. J., and Toronto, Ont.

Now Made With Menthol!

Many revel in the reviving, snowy coolness that a dash of menthol adds to your shave. Now you can enjoy Mennen either way. To get the mentholized ask for the Mennen tube with the red ball.

He had just two weeks to plug for that examination, and seventeen boys took it, but he got the appointment.

Today General Pershing is very glad he did. He has never spent a dull day in military service. He has found it interesting, likes to be with men and work with them and train them out in the field. He always liked to have a well-trained outfit, whether a cavalry troop or the A. E. F. with two million. It is better for the men, too, he thinks. Preciseness and thoroughness stand one in good stead in battle.

The General's voice lowered, as he revealed something close to his heart.

"My one big rule for happiness," he said, "is to have something worthwhile to do, and do it with all there is in me—no matter what the circumstances. The old saying that anything worth doing at all is worth doing well is a good motto. If anyone should ask me for advice, I would say something like this:

"'Whatever your job is, put your whole soul into it. Don't do it half way. Do it the best way you can at this time. That particular chance will never come again.'

"That is not only the best way to be happy but the only way to prepare yourself for your next step forward. I have tried all my life to live up to that rule."

"Is that your guiding principle?" I asked.

"That and another rather like it," the General replied. "I believe that an honest-minded man won't do anything very wrong, however strange or complicated the circumstances. If he means to do right, he will. So I suppose you might sum it up this way:

"'Do as right as you know how, all the time.'

"I think that's a good rule for boys to start to follow. It is a strong conviction with me. In fact, I don't believe in having anything but strong convictions on the important, basic things of life. After a man has thought a thing out the best way he can, and found out what seems right, how can he have any but a strong conviction about it?"

SO THE General honestly enjoyed the dread plebe year at West Point. The jokes and horsing, if not dangerously rough, he found just part of the game, and thought a good plebe should take them that way. If later he did a little horsing himself, that was in the game too. Probably his thoroughness as much as anything—though he was older in years and experience than many classmates—enabled him to finish First Captain of the Corps of Cadets. He was chosen perpetual president of his class also. He was not a wonderful student but did his best and got just one 'max,' in Philosophy, not the mathematics of the hard-boiled regular. Then he was commissioned a second lieutenant in the cavalry, thanks partly to his fondness for horses, and sent to chase Indians.

"Did you give up all idea of the law and becoming a judge?" I asked.

"For a while. Mother was reconciled to my being a soldier, and I had my duty to do. From 1886 to 1890 the Indians kept me busy. But then for four years I was military instructor at the University of Nebraska, at Lincoln, and the chance was too good to lose. I studied law and got my degree. I liked the army, but I

"We're not sick, Daddy. Why are you taking us to the Doctor?"
"Why? To do all we can to keep you from ever getting sick."

YOUR children will probably never forget the odd experience of being taken to the doctor when they are perfectly well. Perhaps no other act of yours could stamp more indelibly on their minds the wisdom of preventing sickness.

When your boys and girls were ill nothing was left undone to make them as comfortable as possible and to help them to get well. But have you done what you can do to spare them from future illnesses?

Have you guarded against diphtheria, typhoid, smallpox and rickets? Have you had adenoids removed? Teeth, eyes, throats, legs and feet—every part of the body should be examined. Modern medical science teaches us that in order to prevent much needless disease and suffering every child should have a complete physical examination at least once a year.

Make May 1928 a banner month for your children. Have them weighed, measured and examined for known and unknown defects. Give them a fair start toward a happy and useful life.

wasn't sure then that I should always stay in it. Now, if promotion got too slow, I could practice law. I never quite gave up the idea until nearly fifteen years later, when I became a general officer."

So when President Roosevelt promoted Captain Pershing over eight hundred other officers to the rank of brigadier general, unknowingly he may have saved to the army its most illustrious figure since Grant. The almost unprecedented, if entirely legal, leap-frogging was earned by a splendid record in Cuba"—the coolest man under fire I ever saw," his commander wrote—and extraordinary— service in the Philippines among the Moros, whose language and ways Pershing learned as did few Americans. That same promotion sent the General back among them in 1909, to begin what in retrospect he calls the best period of his life.

FOR as he relinquished a boyhood dream, the law, he realized a man's ambition, and married the woman he loved, the daughter of Senator Warren of Wyoming. Until its untimely tragic end, it was a splendid, happy marriage. Its softening, refining ten years gave the seasoned trooper, after twenty years' soldiering, his only real home and family life in the almost fifty years since he left Laclede. Even now, he cannot talk about it quite unmoved.

Four years were spent in the Philippines, mostly on the Moro Island of Mindanao, whither the newly created brigadier general had been sent as governor. There the children were born, three daughters and a son, Warren, now a freshman at Yale. There, as the children were baptized, husband and wife were confirmed together by Bishop Brent, later chief chaplain of the A. E. F.

In those inspiring years General Pershing did some of his best work, that helped prepare him for the vast problems of the World War.

Nobody understands him who does not understand those four years. His job was to bring not a sword but peace, to a distraught land of fanatical Mohammedans, warlike, stubbornly resisting any but the most tactful guidance. He succeeded, and today, despite greater successes, he remembers that with greatest satisfaction. It was won fully as much by the boy who did everything on the farm, who taught school, who studied how men govern themselves through laws, as by the regular soldier. It could not have been done by a hard-boiled disciplinarian. It took sympathy, understanding, consideration. Not to appreciate that is to get him wrong. Brigadier General John J. Pershing made the Moros stop fighting; but John Pershing of Laclede taught them better ways to spend their time.

By late 1913, he had beaten the Moro kris into a plowshare. Crops were the best ever and so were revenue collections and school attendance, while more money was appropriated for school buildings than in all the previous American occupation. For the first time in history, Moros were putting money into a bank, just opened.

But when Villa and other imitators raided the Mexican border, the cavalryman Pershing was sent there, and there he received the news that fire in the Presidio, military headquarters at San Francisco, had taken his wife and three daughters. Only the baby, Warren, had been saved. Those who saw General Pershing then knew how terrible the blow was, how fortunate for him that soon afterward he received the important task of leading the expedition into Mexico after Villa.

The days were full of work and responsibility, but the evenings were hard. Once, as he sat alone at his tent door, some strolling Mexican musicians played near by for his staff, who had warned them not to play "La Paloma," Mrs. Pershing's favorite. After a while the General walked into the firelight, and asked the musicians in excellent Spanish:

"Won't you play 'La Paloma,' please?"

At the last note, he walked slowly back to his tent.

He took his own advice, followed his guiding principle, and put his whole soul into his job, to catch Villa. By hard marches and rides, by clever stratagems, he would have succeeded, but for orders from Washington. Like a soldier, he obeyed the President's orders, and stopped.

"I've never indulged much in retrospection," the General says, "nor figuring out what might have been. There has always been too much to do in the present."

The World War had begun; we were trying to be neutral, but our success looked doubtful. Also, here were fifteen thousand husky regulars in a country none too friendly. General Pershing started a stiff training schedule of European methods adapted to America, for even then he believed that the World War had not changed the principles of warfare, as he maintained later in France to the disgruntlement of some of our Allies.

He had a human side. After one pay day, the General passed an overturned wagon, from behind which sounded excited voices and click of dice. He spoke to the men engaged in winning baby some shoes, and the crap game moved into the brush.

"What did he say to you?" asked an inquisitive correspondent.

"Oh, the old man's all right," a doughboy replied. "He said: 'You better get farther away from the trail.'"

WITH more serious transgressions, however, he was less lenient, unlike some others who maintained that "soldiers will be soldiers." His fifteen thousand that came out of Mexico were not only the best trained but the most upstanding, as they were the largest American military force that had been assembled in many years. He had been putting his whole soul into today's job, so making tomorrow's, the World War, easier for his country. Many did not know that then, some did not understand it. They had him wrong.

President Wilson hadn't. He valued a general who could be vigorous in pursuit, silent when balked, obedient and efficient, and who had no political intrigues. As his chief of staff in the Meuse-Argonne said the other day: "Pershing was very exceptional—always was."

The General doesn't talk war much now, except to very close friends, or ex-doughboys. He likes good doughboy stories. But the present is interesting, retrospect foreign to his nature. He does not discuss his relations with Allied leaders, or with President Wilson, except to say that probably no American commander in history, save perhaps Grant, had greater freedom of action or, on the whole, more loyal support than he.

In 1917-18 titled foreigners all looked alike to him. He did his duty then, upholding the American viewpoint; he does it now, keeping silent, and can point to abundant justification in the results attained by some who have been less discreet.

Because of this silence, it is not appreciated what difficulty General Pershing had to obtain from the United States the men and supplies he needed, how long it took to arouse the Government and the country fully to the fact that they really must hurry, unless they were to lose the war. It is not understood yet how nearly that happened. The General foresaw it, in the dreary winter of 1917-18, and was pushing every day to move the War Department to help him arm for the great German offensive that was coming.

There were dark days in March, 1918, when the great German drive came, and even clerks at G. H. Q. were issued helmets and gas masks. Darker still was late May, and early June, when the Germans broke through on the Chemin des Dames and reached Château Thierry, forty miles from Paris.

"That was the worst time," General Pershing says; then, with a glow of pride, "But then we really got into it."

"The strain on you must have been terrific," I suggested.

"We-e-e-ll," the General deprecated, "I had been training for it all my life, and especially when I came to France. Taking care of myself. My best exercise was riding horseback." This with the half-enthusiastic, half-ashamed smile with which a man mentions a hobby.

IN FRANCE, General Pershing rode every morning before breakfast or else before dinner. He did a daily dozen in the morning. He had to work many evenings, and do a lot of automobile riding, scarcely sport compared with riding horseback. At meals he talked about subjects unconnected with the war, with his staff, General Harbord, General McAndrew, Colonel Boyd, and many guests. Those were the principal relaxations during the war.

During the St. Mihiel and Meuse-Argonne battles he had a special train, with sleeping cars and office car, a sort of traveling office. It was all work there.

"One of my most valuable habits was that of dismissing a subject from my mind once it was settled," the General said:

"I've always done that—think it must be inborn."

That recalled what Vice President Dawes, then an A. E. F. officer, wrote in his diary:

> Pershing is the man for this great emergency. He has an immense faculty for disposing of things. He is not only a great soldier, but he has great common sense and tremendous energy.

Modern war makes all generals—the A. E. F.'s needs made him, particularly—more like the head of a great industry, a super-executive, than one of the old-style, flashing, dashing captains. He could not live in a tent among his men, as in Mexico. But he never forgot them.

Only a few hours after the first Americans were killed or captured in a German trench raid, November 2d, 1917, General Pershing was in the smashed-up front line trenches where it had happened, seeing for

The Secret of her Popularity a glorious flashing smile

Since Childhood Days
Miss Gittere has used this one dental cream and look at her lovely teeth today

Miss Gittere in 8th-Grade Days

NO WONDER she's popular! Wherever she goes, her charming personality wins a host of admiring friends.

Much of Miss Dorothy Gittere's charm is due to a really remarkable smile. A smile that shows two even rows of sparkling, lustrous teeth.

Miss Gittere tells us she has used but one dental cream during the past 18 years. Daily cleaning with Colgate's and a trip to the dentist every six months . . . that's her secret.

Many tell same story

In this country, and in foreign countries the world over, you will find thousands of men and women like Miss Gittere who began using Colgate's ten, fifteen, even twenty years ago, whose teeth today are exceptionally sound and beautiful.

Many of these people are grateful enough to write to us sincere, unsolicited reports from people proud of the soundness and attractiveness of their teeth.

There is nothing mysterious about these enviable results.

The men and women fortunate enough to secure them did nothing that you cannot easily and quickly do yourself.

They visited their dentists for periodic inspections. And they used Colgate's.

Choose your dentifrice on the basis of results. Follow the lead of those who have already kept their teeth sound for years.

Simply adopt for your own use the dentifrice most popular among people with well-preserved teeth.

Also, wouldn't it be an immense satisfaction to know that the dentifrice you were using was the one which dentists recommend most frequently?

Accept our free offer

So, for lovely teeth . . . for teeth that make your smile the social and business asset that it should be . . . ask your druggist to-day for Colgate's. Or, if you prefer, let us send you a sample to try.

Clean

Years ago we set out to make the best dentifrice possible. We interviewed leading dental authorities. They told us that the one thing a dentifrice should do is to clean teeth. We then produced Ribbon Dental Cream —designing it to do that one thing superlatively well. It is not medicated, because all experiments in the meantime have sustained the original principle that cleansing is the only thing a dentifrice can properly do.

L C Smith

with the 10-KEY key-set tabulator

IN addition to the many outstanding advantages of the L C Smith there is now available a Ten-Key Key-Set Tabulator.

This convenient feature is not an attachment, but is built into a new series of L C Smith models called the "Ten-Key Tabulator Models," which cover the entire range of carriage widths—10, 12, 14, 18, 20 and 26 inches.

The ten tabulator keys have white numerals on a black background, so that they are readily distinguishable from the other keys.

The tabulator feature in no way interferes with the use of the machine for general office work. You can handle general correspondence, card-writing, stencil-cutting and special jobs of tabulating—all on the same machine.

The tabulator stops are all set and cleared mechanically; very simply.

Merely by pressing one of the tabulator keys the carriage is brought directly into position to write in the column desired.

Most important of all is the fact that with this new convenience you obtain all the other advantages of L C Smith—ball-bearing construction, light touch, easy action, speed, quietness, durability, interchangeable platens and rigid carriage. (The rigid carriage is particularly important with the wide models.)

Write today for illustrated folder describing our new Ten-Key Tabulator models.

himself. From there he went to the base hospital at Bazeilles to tell the wounded how proud of them everybody at home would be, and two correspondents who met the General as he left thought they saw moisture in his eyes.

"What are the principal lessons of our war experience for the American people, General?" I asked him.

"Oh, I could write pages and pages about that," he replied, amused but in earnest. "Why, first and foremost, we should try to prevent future wars by understanding other peoples better. Our people should read about them more, study their ways of thought, if we can't all travel and see. Our Government should seek closer relations with other Governments, avoiding, of course, entanglements. Without becoming militaristic—we could never do that—we should be better prepared to make war efficiently, in case we should be forced to again, than we were in 1917."

Then the General said emphatically something that is rather startling even now:

"If we could have armed and equipped even a half-million men, and sent them to France early in 1917, the war could have been won that year, not a year later. Our citizens should know this, and other things bearing upon the nation's welfare.

"One of my very greatest interests now," General Pershing continued, "is in doing what I can to arouse all the people whom I can reach to greater interest in taking their part in the government of country, state, city, or town. I try to get them to attend caucuses, and register and vote, in all elections. That is the only way to make the nation strong, and it's good for people to do it too."

"And your other greatest interests, General?" I asked.

"My deepest interest," he replied, "is in a work that appeals to me greatly—to keep green for all time the memory of the Americans who gave their lives in France, where many are still buried."

As chairman of the American Battle Monuments Commission, General Pershing has just completed a careful plan to erect memorial chapels at American cemeteries and monuments on American battlefields. Work has started on these, and the General will supervise it carefully, thoughtfully, lovingly. He often goes to France to see about it.

"Then, as to the rest of my time, I have a large correspondence with former officers, some who are good enough to call themselves admirers, old friends from Missouri or Nebraska, or all over the world.

OF FRIENDS, General Pershing now has more, sees more, and enjoys more than ever before in his life. One job of his secretary is to work in all the callers.

Sometimes they disorganize his schedule and he eats a sandwich at his desk and calls it lunch—but he doesn't mind. The General likes to talk to his callers.

"General," I said, "two years ago I met you striding through the Metropolitan Museum of Art, in New York, as you used to on inspections. Were you enjoying art or inspecting the Metropolitan?"

"I was enjoying art," the General said, without a moment's hesitation and with enthusiasm. "I always have enjoyed it. I go to the Metropolitan or any other art gallery whenever I can. In Paris I always

The AIRMAN travels fast -in greatest comfort

The new Seven-Passenger Airman Sedan

CONTINUED, hard, fast driving—for hours on end—with no fear of injury to the motor, with no sense of car-strain, with no fatigue to the driver and passengers—

That is the type of performance which has won for the Franklin Airman the title of "the most comfortable mile-a-minute car ever built."

What is it that gives Franklin this roadability, unmatched by any other car? A more efficient and dependable motor, air-cooled like the famous airplane motors—with sustained high power. A flexible chassis that absorbs the majority of the road shocks before they can reach the body. Full-elliptic springs, with double cushioning effect, that also smooth the action of 4-wheel, hydraulic brakes. Scientific light-weight construction that eases control and holds securely to the road.

These and many other exclusive features, throughout a wide range of distinctive types, will make your next car an Airman—if you will but arrange for the kind of demonstration which only Franklin can give. Favorable terms of payment are offered.

FRANKLIN AUTOMOBILE COMPANY, SYRACUSE

Scientific spring suspension—four full-elliptic springs provide an unusual degree of riding comfort—the total spring-length on each side is actually greater than the wheelbase.

When he begins to grow away from you

This simple plan to help you guide him

HOW anxious he is to grow up and face the world alone! But, to give him the right start—that's his mother's problem.

He's so careless. Hard on his clothes—forgetful of responsibility—unconscious of what his sturdy little body needs. The matter of food, for instance. What a sketchy breakfast he'd bolt down—if you'd let him!

Other people's boys and girls have to be watched for this, too. Knowing this, school authorities are making a nation-wide campaign to help rouse youngsters' enthusiasm for the right sort of breakfast every day. They are emphasizing the thing that mothers know will stick to little ribs all morning. A hot, cooked cereal.

Tests made in great cities have shown what all teachers and mothers have already found out: that children are seriously handicapped in the school room and at play when they do not have a hot, cooked cereal, regularly, in the morning. Displayed on the walls of over 70,000 school rooms today is this slogan:

"Every boy and girl needs a hot cereal breakfast"

You know how sure you are that they are ready for their day when you see them empty their bowls of hot Cream of Wheat.

Here are three reasons why mothers and health authorities for over 30 years have considered Cream of Wheat an ideal hot, cooked cereal for children: 1. It gives in abundance both mental and physical energy. 2. Cream of Wheat is exceptionally easy and quick to digest. 3. Children love its creamy goodness.

It's so easy to safeguard your children in this way. The simple plan described below will help you establish the regular habit of a hot bowl of Cream of Wheat. Start now. Your grocer has it.

visit the Louvre and the Luxembourg—and I think I have formed some idea of what is good."

"When you are at home, how do you spend your time?"

"Why not come and see?" he asked.

General Pershing lives alone most of the year, while his son, Warren, is at Yale. The General tries to keep him out of print and away from the cameras. He thinks the less parents say about their children sometimes, the better for the children.

The General has a two-room suite at the Metropolitan Club, in Washington, little over a block from his office in the State, War, and Navy Building. The rooms are comfortable but hardly palatial. Standing at the door from a narrow hallway to the living-room, one is reminded of the simplicity of an early American home.

The room is bright, with green-curtained windows on two sides, letting in plenty of light to be reflected by bare buff-tinted walls. There is a dark gray rug upon the floor, in the center of it a good-sized octagonal walnut table, covered with papers.

Separated from the desk only by a window, is a small fireplace, and before that is the General's favorite chair, a low, dark, gray-brown stuffed arm chair, best described as "just an arm chair"—but comfortable. Here, in brown leather slippers, the General does his reading.

"Just now I am reading about Lincoln again," he said. "Never get tired of that. I am reading Carl Sandburg's life, the volumes that he calls 'The Prairie Years.' There is mighty good stuff in them. It appeals to me especially because I know the West, and try to know Lincoln."

THE General keeps up with what's going on, here and abroad. He reads newspapers, magazines, especially reviews and current-events magazines, American and foreign. A smaller table is covered ten deep with papers and magazines.

"I like to read detective stories—for relaxation," he said—"usually have some around, and I like history and biography, to see what other peoples and people have made of life. What I read depends on my mood. I usually put in several nights a week reading when I'm in Washington. I never was one of those people who must be going out somewhere every single night."

General Pershing practically doesn't smoke at all. He had smoked ever since he was a boy on the farm, was smoking incessantly when, at fifty, he decided he would be better off if he stopped—so he "put his mind on it," and stopped.

General Pershing cannot live on exact routine, for he travels quite a little. But he is usually up by eight o'clock or half past and has breakfast at the Metropolitan Club. Usually by ten o'clock he is at his desk in his office in the State, War, and Navy Building, where he is often a fixture until six o'clock. He likes to work.

Life is agreeing with General Pershing. He seems scarcely older than during the war. There may be a little more white in his sandy hair, but not much more; perhaps face and figure are fuller, but not much. The smile seems readier in these piping times of peace than in those tense, stern days, but that is not strange. Though he smiled then, and often. Those who thought not, had him wrong.

—DIRT PER MINUTE

The accurate measure of electric cleaner efficiency is dirt per minute

House cleaning is easier now

. . . . thanks to The HOOVER Dusting Tools

HOW old-fashioned it seems—the tearing up of carpets, the carrying out of furniture, the beating of rugs and brushing of draperies that meant housecleaning a few years ago . . . Yet some women do it still. Such drudgery is quite unnecessary—thanks to Hoover Dusting Tools. They search out the dirt from every crack and corner, clean thoroughly and quickly overstuffed furniture, hangings and door frames—all the difficult, hard-to-get-at places.

And they do it so easily and effortlessly. Each tool is carefully planned for its purpose—to eliminate stooping and reaching, to prevent tiring. Swivel joints make twisting your wrists unnecessary and spring catches lock the different units securely in place.

Yet dusting is but a small part of the aid the Hoover offers in housecleaning. Its greatest service is in the cleaning of rugs. Here you secure the thorough cleanliness which only The Hoover can give, through its deep-beating principle—"Positive Agitation"—which repeated tests have shown removes more dirt per minute than other cleaners. We shall be glad to demonstrate the Hoover's greater dirt per minute capacity in your home. Because d. p. m. represents the real gauge of electric cleaner capacity, you should see this test before buying any electric cleaner. Telephone the Authorized Hoover Dealer.

Cash Prices, Model 700, $75. Model 543, $59.50. Dusting tools, $12.50. Easy payments if desired. Only $6.25 down. Prices slightly higher west of the Rockies and in Canada. Hoover dealers will make you an allowance on your old machine.

LET YOUR FACE DECIDE

You may think there couldn't be any better shaving preparation than your present favorite. Maybe you're right.

But millions of happy shavers think BARBASOL has everything else beaten at least three ways: faster, smoother, closer. We hope they're right.

Why not settle this shaving question the modern American way?

Make this 3-day test

Use your favorite shaving soap just the way you use it every day—lather up, rub in, hot towel, lather again—but only on one side of your face.

Now wet down the other side—with hot water or cold, so long as it's wet—and spread on a film of creamy, cooling BARBASOL. No brush. No lathering. No rub-in. Just shave! Like this:

1—Wash the face (and leave it wet).
2—Spread on Barbasol (but don't rub in).
3—Shave!

Do this three successive days, and—

Let Your Face Decide!

It will tell you, smartly, which is the soap side, alkali burn and razor pull and beard resistance.

It will tell you, coolly, the BARBASOL side is all smooth and soft—pliant with the natural oils left right in the skin. Just as we said: Faster, Smoother, Closer.

For Modern Shaving

John Bowman's Fifty-Story Dream

Manifestly, then, if the community's tastes are bad, if its views are warped, if its intellectual level is low, and its colleges are unsupported, these three have failed in their duty.

"Parents of today condemn the modern freedom of their children. They forget that it was they who reared the children. Churchmen bewail a moral laxness and indifference to the affairs of the church, but forget their own responsibility as leaders in church affairs. Educators condemn and deplore student interest in dancing and athletics, overlooking that it is they themselves who have been charged with the training of these students in the way they should go. In the theatre when a play fails to 'go over' it is withdrawn and a new play substituted for it, or else the original play is rewritten. Isn't it time that the home and school and church profit by this lesson?"

COMING back to Pittsburgh and its impoverished university, it was as a playwright that Doctor Bowman saw the problem there. The rich city was his theatre. The theme of education as typified by the university was his play. The play was not "going over"—the bulk of the audience had walked out. Plainly, something was wrong with the play as written and enacted.

Near the foot of the hill on which stood the old university buildings was a vacant square of ground. It was the heart of the civic center of Pittsburgh. That ground Bowman picked for his stage, and his was a literal and not a figurative selection. Somehow he got possession of the stage for $1,500,000 and then started to rewrite the play.

"The usual appeals had been made, and failed," he told me. "Every word that could be used had been used, every argument exhausted. Cold arguments would be only a waste of time. Something was needed that the people could see, that would arouse their imaginations, stir their feeling and their pride in the university. It had to be as modern as the age, startling, true, beautiful, and daring as the spirit of the city itself, a promise of the New Day in tangible form."

He studied his stage, lived on it. Education was the "Vital Thing" and he must make the city see it as that, as the dominant factor in its progress. He must dramatize the thing! How? In brick and stone and mortar that would endure. And in vision suddenly the rewritten play took form, a drama in stone that soared toward the heavens and mingled with the clouds themselves! He would build on this stage a cathedral—a Cathedral of Learning! A mighty skyscraper!

"To catch the spiritual, driving, courageous stuff that made Pittsburgh"—that is what he wished to do in this building he envisioned. To express power, achievement, righteousness, culture, the spirit of a new age, to express these in stone was what he purposed. Above all, the building, towering to the stars, was to express

They told me to try P. A.

THEY said: "You've never really smoked a pipe unless you've smoked Prince Albert." I divided their enthusiasm by two, and decided to take a chance. Chance? Well, if that's what it was, I won! I knew I was "going somewhere" when I got that first whiff.

A few seconds later, I arrived. Boy, what a taste! Cool as a hat-check girl when she kidnaps your kelly. Sweet as her smile when you pay her the ransom. Mellow and mild and long-burning, yet with that rich, satisfying body that lets you know you're smoking. Yes, yes!

My pipe-program begins right after breakfast and runs far, far into the night. P. A. never tires my taste. Each pipe-load tastes better than the one before, if such a thing is possible. If you think I'm over-enthusiastic, you can check me up—with a pipe and a tidy red tin.

P. A. gives you more in every way — TWO full ounces in each tin.

life, because education as Bowman conceives it is life. It was to be the better life dramatized in stone! Fifty stories in its height!

Charles Z. Klauder, of Philadelphia, is one of America's leading architects. Doctor Bowman went to him with his vision and tried to put it into words. He found it was beyond words; Klauder did not get the whole idea. Words, pictures, literature—these did not help much. Finally the two listened to music. They listened to the fire music in "Die Walküre."

"THERE you have it," said Bowman, "climax rising above climax, when you felt that each was the top of human achievement."

Klauder knew music. His soul was stirred. "Those climaxes are buttresses," he answered, and for the next five hours, he drew music freehand in the form of a cathedral. Sheet after sheet he threw aside, each time coming closer to a great expression of courage and spirituality.

That day was a success! At the end of it Klauder was all eagerness, but he remarked, "I'm tired. I'd like to go to Europe for a month."

"Splendid idea," said Bowman.

Klauder went to Europe and came back still more eager. For three years the two worked. Klauder, now as obsessed as was Bowman, designed only to destroy. He filled wastebaskets with his discarded efforts, tried as he never had tried before. Finally, he showed a finished design to Bowman. It represented months of work.

"Is it the best you can do?" asked Bowman.

Klauder's answer was to put aside the design and to begin again. "To be able to do that," said Doctor Bowman to me, softly, "is an attribute of genius." So the work went on. Klauder varied his design a hundred times, just to get one.

And genius was in this one when the design was finished. I can't describe it any more than could Bowman, who left its description to great music. Here were lines, not pulled into steeples, but parallel and projecting themselves into infinite space.

Here were mass and proportion perfectly blended, rising fifty stories above the rock foundations. Here was an inanimate thing that was animate, alive, speaking the language of the human heart and soul. Here was the new drama of the university.

Bowman took the design of this cathedral-skyscraper to Pittsburgh and gave it to the city. Pittsburgh looked, gasped at the man's daring, and paused in its stride, amazed. The pictured edifice seemed to speak; it did speak!

Within three short months Pittsburgh's people, who had been indifferent, subscribed more than ten millions of dollars to the university! Eight millions of this, it was specifically designated, were to be used in erecting the building. The remainder was to be employed in supplementary buildings, land, and endowments.

This money came from the wealthy; it came from the poor. Steel workers by the thousands, and bankers; florists and 10,000 department store clerks; manufacturers and street-cleaners; almost 100,000 school children who "earned" what they gave; Hungarians and Armenians—these contributed.

Advice to wives

whose husbands don't save money

By a wife

MY husband and I used to be careless with money. Fred made a good salary but we spent practically every dollar of it.

Then something happened that opened our eyes. Fred was taken sick and confined to bed for five weeks. By the time he was able to go back to work we were penniless—worse than that, we had been obliged to borrow money to live.

After that I began to worry about money. What would happen to us if Fred were sick for several months? What would happen if he were incapacitated in some way and unable to go on with his work?

How to end money worries

One day a little book called "How to Get the Things You Want" fell into my hands. It was one of the most valuable, interesting and unusual books I ever read. The book made me think of Fred and the hopes I had for him. Here's what it said:

You're interested in having the best possible time while you live—with the least worry and grind and discomfort.

You don't want to pay rent all your life—you hope to own your own home some day. And you don't get any thrill out of the idea of appearing at an office or a mill or a store at the same old hour every morning until you die.

You want to quit work sometime. And when you do quit, you want to feel that you're justified in quitting—that you've earned it.

Then the book told how Fred and I and the children could be sure of a steady income even if Fred became totally disabled and unable to go to work again. It told how we could provide money to pay the children's way through college—money to leave our home free of debt. It told how we could provide an income to live on when Fred decided to retire from business. Best of all, it explained how we could do these things on the moderate salary Fred was making.

I showed the book to Fred. He was interested. We decided to follow the plan outlined. In a short time we had taken steps to provide for every single one of the things we wanted. Soon we found ourselves on the road toward a life free of money worries.

"It was the happiest moment of my life!"

Kansas City, Mo.

"A BATHING BEAUTY CONTEST was held in our city, the winner to receive the title, 'Miss Kansas City.'

"I was run down and under weight. My digestion was bad and I was very nervous—probably due to poor elimination. My physician advised fresh Yeast. I ate it—3 cakes a day, dissolved in water. In two weeks my elimination and digestion were better, my nerves had quieted and my weight had righted itself. My complexion cleared up too. I felt fine.

"Well, I won over 200 girls, receiving the unanimous vote of the judges for beauty of face and form. It was the happiest moment of my life.

"I then went to Atlantic City, to represent Kansas City in the National Bathing Beauty Contest. I arrived with the required weight, a complexion the judges termed 'peaches and cream' and an unlimited amount of pep—which I surely needed to stand the strain of a solid week of judging.

"Thanks again to Fleischmann's Yeast, I finished third in the Atlantic City finals. You will always find Yeast in my diet."

MARGUERITE JORDAN.

Wins title, "MISS KANSAS CITY," in beauty competition

AS fresh as any garden vegetable, Fleischmann's Yeast is a pure health food.

It cleanses the intestines. Keeps them active. Frees you from the constipation that saps your vigor and health. Soon your indigestion gives way. Skin troubles vanish. Your whole outlook on life brightens.

Buy 2 or 3 days' supply of Fleischmann's Yeast at a time from your grocer and keep in any cool dry place. Write for latest booklet on Yeast in the diet—free. Health Research Dept. J-52, The Fleischmann Co., 701 Washington St., New York.

"I learned to ride as I learned to walk," says MISS RITA LA ROY. Who will doubt it in the face of the testimony above? Miss La Roy writes:

"AT AN EARLY AGE I was taken by my father to live on a large ranch. Before I was ten years old I was riding the plains with a .22 automatic strapped to my saddle. Breaking in ponies was a regular thing for me. One year I rode in the annual stampede.

"Then—my father died. The ranch grew unbearably lonely. I came to the city to live.

"But in spite of my hardy childhood life I gradually became run down, suffering with constipation and frequent colds. I was beginning to become distressed... Three years ago I began eating Fleischmann's Yeast. Next winter I didn't have a single bad cold. And my constipation was helped, too."

RITA LA ROY, Hollywood, Calif.

"I was placed in a very embarrassing position," writes William Blakeney. His letter follows:

"IN MY WORK with one of the largest photographic studios in the world I meet hundreds of people every day. Naturally it was particularly embarrassing to me when my face broke out in pimples.

"Various soaps and ointments didn't help. A boil broke out on my skin. I couldn't sleep. Then more boils, leaving ugly scars—what was I to do?

"The advice of a former classmate was 'Fleischmann's Yeast'. I tried it, and in a month the improvement was wonderful. My skin cleared up. I felt great. Yeast surely was a life-saver to me—I can't praise it enough?"

WILLIAM BLAKENEY, Newtonville, Mass.

Easy, natural*—this new way to health, to greater zest in living

Eat three cakes of Fleischmann's Yeast regularly every day, one cake before each meal or between meals. Eat it just plain, or dissolved in water (hot or cold) or any other way you like. For stubborn constipation physicians recommend drinking one cake in a glass of hot water—not scalding—before each meal and before going to bed. And train yourself to form a regular daily habit. As you are benefited by eating Yeast you can gradually discontinue dangerous, habit-forming cathartics.

Pipe Smoker Finds Pep-Producer and Solace All in One

When a man has a good pipe and the right tobacco, he has a true and helpful friend. Never was there a more convincing illustration of this fact than the following letter from Mr. Arbogast. Here is a gentleman whose work makes a constant drain upon his nervous energy, and all day long his faithful pipe and favorite tobacco help him produce pep.

Then, at the day's end, the soothing fragrance of his favorite pipe-smoke wipes all cares away. Here's what he says:

Cincinnati, Ohio
June 1, 1927

Larus & Bro. Co.,
Richmond, Va.
Gentlemen:

My good old pipe has just reminded me of a dozen promises to write a bit of appreciation of its affinity—Edgeworth.

Fate, kind or otherwise, has drawn me into a line of work that calls for the very utmost expenditure of nervous energy, tact, and perseverance. I can think of many more pleasant things than conducting fund-raising campaigns for hospitals, churches, etc.

When you are up against a barrage of questions by excitable women, doubtful men, and self-confident millionaires, trying to harmonize the whole in an effort to raise thousands of dollars where none grew before—well, you need a Pep-Producer—that's all.

And when the day's work is done, along toward midnight, what a blessed solace comes with the first draw of Edgeworth. Then my pipe and I hold a real conference, and the obstacles fade away with the smoke. Then we wonder why they should have bothered us at all.

I feel qualified to speak because a can a day is my measure of appreciation. The old pipe O.K.'s this letter and insists that without Edgeworth we could not have raised the thousands of dollars we did.

Good old Hod! Good old Edgeworth!

Sincerely yours,
William H. Arbogast.

As a pipe "affinity" (which Mr. Arbogast so aptly calls it) Edgeworth has brought many a man and pipe together for a grand and glorious lifetime friendship.

To those who have never tried Edgeworth, we make this offer:

Let us send you free samples of Edgeworth so that you may put it to the pipe test. If you like the samples, you'll like Edgeworth wherever and whenever you buy it, for it never changes in quality.

Write your name and address to Larus & Brother Company, 3 S. 21st Street, Richmond, Va.

Edgeworth is sold in various sizes to suit the needs and means of all purchasers. Both Edgeworth Plug Slice and Edgeworth Ready-Rubbed are packed in small, pocket-size packages, in handsome humidors holding a pound, and also in several handy in-between sizes.

On your radio—tune in on WRVA, Richmond, Va. —the Edgeworth Station. Wave length 254.1 meters. Frequency 1180 kilocycles.

Doctor Bowman told me of a night during those three months when he spoke in a little hall in a foreign section of the city. The audience was made up of folk who spoke little English. A woman stood up. She had been an immigrant, but her children were American born. In the building she saw personified the promise of America which had brought her across the sea.

"I have no money," she said in broken English. "All my man earns goes to keep us. But in our house we will go without meat for a week. We will give what we save this way."

"At our house we will go without a meal a day for a week," said a man. "We will give that." And one after another followed him to their feet, until the whole audience pledged itself in such ways to help. The idea spread. The Greeks, the Poles, the Italians, and other groups took it up, until thousands, inspired by the building, gave their bits.

Today, the building's foundation is done. The steel skeleton of it has started to rise triumphantly. Besides this, a great stadium that will hold 65,000 people has been built. The university is no longer troubled by debt; there is no longer a yearly deficit; almost 12,000 students are enrolled in the university classes.

WHAT does this change signify, not to Pittsburgh alone but to your community and mine? What is our interest in the promise of tomorrow expressed in the building?

It was with these questions in mind that I went to Doctor Bowman. If Pittsburgh's problem was typical, then the solution to which it is turning is of national import. What is going on in Pittsburgh may be a signpost along the way we, too, are to go, as marchers in a national procession.

"First, let me make this fact clear," began Doctor Bowman. "We do not pretend, for a moment, here in Pittsburgh, that the mere erection of a building, however fine and inspiring it may be, is going to solve all of our educational shortcomings and ills. The new building is only the prologue in the play, a promise.

"The primary object of the building was to arouse the community to the importance of the university to Pittsburgh. Its next object was to arouse the university itself to its own responsibility and possibilities. Beyond those two aims was yet a third, greater even than both: we wanted a building that would arouse the students who are to use it to give their finest efforts.

"There is a sublimity in fine architecture that is capable of changing lives. The emotions may be awakened by a great structure just as readily as by music, a great poem, or a great painting. This has been recognized for ages; you see it exemplified in the cathedral, and in many churches; you see it in some university buildings, and also in some skyscrapers in our big cities.

"We have our own problems here in America, our own history, our own ambitions. We sought to embody these in our university building so that it will be, when finished, an original and purely American structure inspiring to American students of today.

"The fact that this community in three months gave ten millions of dollars, and that nearly every class in the community contributed, suggests that our people were but awaiting such a building. Also, to me it suggests future educational heights of which we have not dreamed—once the nation's pulse is stirred.

"But the building, as I have said, is only the prologue to our play. A new and better educational structure is being built as a whole as rapidly as we can build it. The classroom itself is being pried loose from tradition and is being brought into stride with the times—and in the classroom are to be found the chief faults of our school system, here and elsewhere."

I ASKED him to name these faults, and he continued:

"Instead of guiding our youth to understanding, we have been trying to stuff understanding down its throat by a process of forcible feeding, while professors stand by as policemen or keepers.

"We have been calling the college, or school, a preparatory course for life and utterly ignoring that it is life—that a boy's life is in progress from the day he is born, and is going on as much when he comes to college as when he leaves it.

"We have been blaming the boy, the times, and outside influences for many failures that justly should be blamed to the school itself and thereby excusing the classroom from a responsibility that belongs to it.

"We have let the classroom be ruled by tradition instead of by need, with the consequence that its methods have become antiquated and even ridiculous in the eyes of students.

"Perhaps these indictments of the classroom sound sweeping and harsh. They are no more so than the occasion demands; for, after all, the real test of whether or not our educational system has been satisfactory lies in what it has done, and not in what it has hoped to do. Give the average boy his choice between attending school or a circus, and he will choose the circus. I have yet to know a boy who had to be driven to a circus, but I've known hundreds who had to be driven to school.

"The simple truth is that the circus has set out to capture the boy's interest and has succeeded in doing it. The school has set out to do the identical thing and, in competition with the circus, has failed. When I say boy in this connection I mean youth, all the way from childhood up to manhood. When I say school, I mean our educational plant in all its complexities. When I say circus, I mean any competitor of the school, or classroom, for youth's interest—the dance, the theatre, football, society, and, in a larger sense, business, industry, and getting rich. The trouble is that the school's rivals have forged ahead and taken more than is their right, while the school has lagged behind and taken less. We can't blame the competitors of the school for this condition if we honestly wish to reverse it—that would be like blaming the rain for the leak in the roof. We must put the blame where it belongs, on the school!

"And once blame has been placed, we should set about to remove it. If teaching methods are bad, we should find new ones. If textbooks are dry, we should rewrite them until they are interesting, or do away with them. If buildings are repellent and out of spirit with the land and day, we

Widening the Telephone Horizon

An Advertisement of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company

IN THE memory of many now living, Alexander Graham Bell made the apparently rash prediction that the day would come when we could talk to other countries, even across wide expanses of water. That was shortly after the historic conversation between Boston and Cambridge, a distance of two miles.

Bell's vision was made a reality when in 1926 New York and London spoke together in two way conversation, and when in 1927 this service was opened to the public between any point in the U. S. A. and Great Britain. Since then, Mexico has been brought into speaking distance; important cities of continental Europe have come within the voice horizon of the United States.

Even more important, the Bell System in the United States now embraces 18,500,000 telephones—a growth for the past year of more than 750,000.

We may now converse with each other from practically any point in this country to any other, and may talk beyond our borders and across the sea. That is measurable progress in widening America's telephone horizon.

While you're "listening in"

Serve Welch's half and half with ginger ale.

With your radio concert—a cool glass of Welch's Grape Juice!

It's mighty refreshing.

And it's so good for you—as though you drank a glass of fresh grapes. Welch's is the juice squeezed out of ripe, fresh grapes.

All the health-building mineral salts, energy value, laxative properties of the fresh fruit are held in this delicious juice.

The delightful flavor of the ripe Concords is held in Welch's too. Served straight or blended, Welch's is always the very best grape juice.

For a long drink, mix Welch's half and half with ginger ale or charged water; or make a pitcher of the always-popular Welch Punch. Recipes are printed on every label.

"That is what we are doing at the University of Pittsburgh. Something has been radically wrong with us in the past, and now we are trying to set ourselves right.

"One of the first and most constructive things we did was to set up a research organization for a research of ourselves, as a university. For years, in common with other universities, we have been making researches for others—in medicine, physics, biology, chemistry, and industrial lines. It never occurred to us, however, that our own educational methods might profit by research. We who were in the business of dispensing knowledge were being guided not by knowledge but by tradition. We were deciding on precedent, not on facts.

"And right in this one practice we found one of the greatest weaknesses of the old system. For example, the only answer we had to give as to whether or not this subject or that should be included in a course, was that it always had been included or excluded, the decision had been made a generation or a century ago. We gave examinations because they always had been given, asked questions because those questions always had been asked. Arbitrarily, we fixed four years of study as a college course, simply because tradition said four years. We taught this boy Latin and that one zoölogy because the subjects had always been taught so. Schoolmen dead and forgotten were dictating our policies, formulating our curriculum, picking our teachers, and training our students, this in classrooms which had not changed since the Middle Ages.

"A parent came to us asking, 'Why did my boy fail?' The only answer we had was that the boy hadn't passed the examination. It never occurred to us that the boy's failure was really our failure. He had come to us and paid good money to get something and we had not delivered the goods, so we called him an idler or a stupid fellow."

"JUST what have you done to date toward solving your problems?" I asked.

"For one thing, we have worked out a way of getting acquainted with our students," was the answer. "Sixty per cent of our freshmen classes come to us from the high schools of Pittsburgh. Those boys and girls used to come to us as strangers, but no more. We concluded that the high schools knew something of these freshmen, so we went to the high schools, which were eager to coöperate. We said, 'When you send us a boy, tell us all you know about him. Tell us of his ambitions, his character, his abilities and his failings. Give us as much as you can of what you have learned in four years.' Further, we invited parents to come to the university at will to talk with the boy's teachers. We tried to divide classes into sections so that no teacher would have under him more than thirty students for instruction at a time. We asked that teachers spend at least fifteen minutes weekly alone with each pupil.

"And as soon as we started to become acquainted with our students, we began to learn why many of them failed. Freshmen were coming here as strangers in a new land. They were lost, confused, lonely in the whirl of university life. Here things moved at a rate to which they were not accustomed. Class followed class. They had no set study periods.

"The very strangeness caused many to fail. Others simply did not know how to study. Some could not read fast enough to keep up with the mass of university reading assignments. Some had physical difficulties. Some were misplaced.

"We began removing the strangeness, teaching them to study, getting at their individual difficulties. The result was that the number of failures in the freshman class during the first semester was reduced by two thirds.

"Now we have gone a step further. We are taking high school students who wish to enter the university, but whose high school work is low, and working with them before they come to the university. This work has two objectives: first, to bring the pupil up to a level that promises success in his university life; and second, to weed out those who will most surely fail, and guide them into work in which they will make a greater success than in college studies.

"YOU may say that an entrance examination, or an 'intelligence' test, or some other such cut-and-dried method would more readily determine fitness for college study. The fault with such tests of intellect is that they don't go far enough: they are not tests of motive and soul.

"The greatest problems of life—marriage, parenthood, and all of the innumerable problems involving character and heart, are not solved by intellect. Nothing in life that is of consequence is ruled by intellect alone. I would ten times rather graduate a boy whose motive is 100 per cent and his intellect only passable, than graduate a boy with 100 per cent intellect but only passable motive. That has been one of our greatest mistakes, one of the primary reasons for our failure in the past: we have emphasized intellect to the neglect of soul, and when there is no soul-inspired motive back of knowledge the latter is worthless and even dangerous.

"The test of intellect overlooks so many things and it tells us so little. We had a boy in one of our engineering classes who was lagging. The boy was doing his best and yet he couldn't keep up. He knew, and the teacher knew, that he would fail in the approaching examinations and have to leave college, disgraced. The teacher talked with him as a friend and guide.

"'What are you interested in?' he asked the boy. 'You've been going to school for twelve years. Some study must have interested you.'

"The boy shook his head. He cared nothing for mathematics, nothing for botany, nothing for literature. From the outset he had just been 'getting by.' The school had aroused no interest.

"'Then outside of school?' pleaded the teacher. 'In all of this world, as you have known it, something must have stirred you.'

"'Yes,' said the boy, and his eyes lighted. 'Birds. I've always loved birds.'

"The very next day that boy was studying biology—and birds. And for the first time in his life he was awake, alive, eager to study. Today he is an ornithologist with promise of becoming a famous one. The friendly interest of a teacher, not a test of intellect, found him the career which was his birthright.

"We have been trying to get to the Keeps food fresh and wholesome —and it's QUIET too!

That sums up in a few words the advantages of Iroquois Electric Refrigeration—the modern method of food preservation. The convenient way, the sanitary way, the economical way, the healthful way.

And because the quiet Iroquois not only produces the "crisp dry cold of a frosty night" so necessary to proper refrigeration, but constantly maintains that same desirable low temperature, it is noted for its efficiency.

This dry cold checks the growth of bacteria and mold, and by preventing decay it safeguards the health of your family.

The moment you plug the electric cord of the quiet Iroquois into the electric outlet, you are through with mopping up the kitchen floor after every visit of the ice-man, through with the moist clamminess of the ice-cooled refrigerator and the unpleasant task of frequent cleaning. There's not a thing left for you to do or think about.

And the Iroquois is so quiet in operation—as quiet as the "gentle whispering of the woodland pines." Mechanically it is so simple and compact that it is practically trouble-proof; and in most localities the cost of operation is less than the cost of ice.

The quiet Iroquois is the delight of housewives, too, because of the wonderful variety of dainties which it enables them to make so easily, and they need never be without a liberal quantity of sparkling ice-cubes.

Any woman would treasure the quiet Iroquois shown in the illustration—would consider the beautiful all-metal cabinet, white enamel inside and outside, a distinct addition to her kitchen. And while it is roomy enough for homes with four or five persons in the family, it is so compact that it is ideally adapted for apartment use.

It is only 61" high, 22½" deep, 26¼" wide. It has unusually large shelf space (9½ square feet) and food storage capacity (5½ cubic feet); and its ice-cube capacity is 110 cubes, or more than 9 pounds of ice—with an extra tray for storing ice-cubes.

There are eight other different types of the quiet Iroquois in all-metal porcelain enamel white or gray cabinets—and every Iroquois is backed by a $40,000,000 corporation. A product of The Iroquois Electric Refrigeration Company, associate of The Barber Asphalt Company, engaged in world-wide business for a half-century.

Write us for illustrated booklet showing the quiet Iroquois line, including a quiet Iroquois electric refrigerating unit for installation in your present ice-box. We will also gladly send you a copy of the Iroquois recipe book, "Chilled and Frozen Delicacies." You owe it to yourself to find out about the quiet Iroquois and to see it in operation.

When was your watch-chain new?

WATCH-CHAINS change as much as watches in design. If the chain you are wearing now was bought several years ago, it probably is out-of-date and old-fashioned looking. . . . A new chain costs very little. Why not get one today?

Simmons Chains offer a range of choice that appeals to men of all ages, in every walk of life. They are priced from $4 to $15. Made of seamless gold-filled wire, manufactured under our own patents in our own factory, they may be obtained in natural, green or white gold. . . . The chain shown here is a Waldemar, No. 29770. Price, $9.75. Ask your jeweler to show you his assortment. R. F. Simmons Company, Attleboro, Mass.

souls of our boys and girls here in Pittsburgh. Instead of charging the student with failure, we are demanding of the teacher, 'Why did you fail with that student?' If the student isn't interested in his work, we are asking what is the matter with the work or with our methods of presenting it.

"Personally, I wish we could do away with all cut-and-dried examinations, honors, marks, and even degrees. I wish we could make one real test of fitness, such as life inevitably makes anyhow—the test of accomplishment alone. When a boy is head over heels in love with a girl no examination on paper is necessary to prove it. And when he is head over heels in love with the work he is doing, no examination is necessary, either. The test should be, 'Is this boy getting out of college what he came to get? Is he ready to go ahead to bigger things? Does he want to go ahead?' To answer these questions first we must know the boy; second, if we want satisfactory answers, we must teach him differently.

"We are teaching differently, but teaching methods are too broad a subject to go into in detail here. Let me instead state our chief aim: to arouse the boy's interest. That aroused, he will learn in the very momentum of his interest. A boy wants to become a chemist. He enters the laboratory and is given some sulphur. He is assigned the task of finding out the principal characteristics of sulphur.

"'How shall I start? What am I to do?' he asks.

"He is dazed and flounders about. He is in a wilderness, through which the teacher is accompanying him only as a companion. The teacher suggests the library might be a guide, and the boy in desperation turns to the library, a seeker, an explorer 'on his own.'

"Perhaps he will flounder for days. He will feel like pitching his books out the window and going home. Then, suddenly, he will make a discovery, find a clue. A second clue and he sees a light beyond the trees. Now he is thinking his way; he is getting somewhere; he is elated by his progress.

"The boy's breath comes fast when at last he discovers the first important fact about sulphur for which he has been seeking. By his own prowess and ingenuity, he has won a victory; and he plunges on to the next, and next. Why, chemistry is not so dull after all! It is a fascinating mystery that he himself can solve! It has byways which no man has yet entered, but which he some day might pierce! On! on!

"BUT, you object, such training is possible only with the very bright boy. Well, why is it? There is the slow boy with persistence and character and good purpose. Is anyone wise enough to say within what range of mental slowness or dullness a boy may be given the opportunity to make the most of himself? A boy must be dull indeed who cannot learn what folk need in order to live happily together, what the significance is of food, clothes, banking, transportation, and good neighbors. Elementary principles of art can, in their application to his life, bring him lasting satisfaction. The materials and surroundings of every day can become effective in his thought.

"It may be that some slow students need five to six years instead of four in a college course. Here is a big-hearted, kindly, gentle, and earnest boy who wishes to be a doctor; but he is a plodder and drops behind in his class; he fails in his examination, because the pace was too fast, and that failure is to bar him forever from medicine. In the same class is a boy brilliant mentally but without one fine impulse of heart; he is going to be a doctor because he wants to make money. And the college aids and abets him in becoming one. Which of these two should have been the doctor?

"What we mistake for dullness often is only lack of interest, or misdirected effort, as was the case with the boy who loved birds. Look at life as it is: you will find many of these 'dull' lads of yesterday in the seats of the mighty today. By no means is it always the honor student who climbs highest.

"BUT for the boy, bright or dull, who does not show progress in reasonable proportion to his ability there is no place at the university. Let us be clear about this matter. A student must either enter the university and do his best, or else, with the understanding of his parents, drop out.

"This policy prevents the waste of parents' money and of the university's money, and allows full and simple sincerity to prevail. We expect the best of our teachers, or they do not stay, and we can't except students from the same rule.

"And, too, the university, the school, any school, can't do its work alone. The parent must be behind the student. There must be a partnership between parent, boy, and school. The boy should have at home a definite place to study. A room alone is preferable, not one into which go the chairs with broken legs and the pictures that nobody else wants, but a room that is comfortable and attractive. Boys and girls are apt to gauge much of their self-respect by the rooms which parents provide for them.

"Then, what sort of conversation does the boy hear at home? How much of the talk is mere gossip? Do parents require themselves to live up to their highest level, as instructors in the school and university are expected to do?

"As I have said in Pittsburgh, the real purpose of the school system of America is to set up in America learning which is life itself. And if the object of the school should be that of arousing the individual, the object of the system should be to arouse the country. Let us send forth from our schools one awakened and enlightened generation, and the next generation will almost awaken of itself. A few such generations will revolutionize the country, because then there will be no question of the partnership between parent and school, and also between industry and school.

"Our colleges have already demonstrated that they can interest youth if they will. Look at our college sports, especially football. Physically, we have improved youth and charged the country with the spirit of better health. It remains for us to deal with the head and soul as successfully as we have with the body. It can be done. It will be done."

More than a fine watch ~ A GREAT AMERICAN WATCH

A very popular model of fine time-keeping qualities. 17-jeweled movement in 14k gold-filled case with engraved bezel and curved back. $50.00.

Illinois' recognition as a great American watch is a high honor. For right here in America are made watches which for accuracy, service and value cannot be surpassed in the markets of the world.

It is significant that the severe requirements for sustained accuracy which the railroads demand are met only by American watches and that the Illinois Bunn Special is one of the two leading watches that time the trains.

The history of Illinois Watches is a proud one. For more than 50 years they have been made with all the care and devotion worthy of a fine art. And for more than 50 years they have been recognized by those who know fine watches as outstanding examples of the best American workmanship.

The Wages of Hate

established home. His partner in this promising venture was a widow whose own first marriage had been unfortunate. The two thus joined in the new household seemed ideally mated, and their happiness was accentuated by the long, hard struggle through which each had gone. All seemed well until some scoundrel wrote an anonymous letter accusing the woman of having had an illicit liaison after the death of her first husband and before she met her present one. She acknowledged the truth of the accusation, pleaded her own wretchedness and desolation as her only excuse, told of her bitter self-reproach and penitence, protested her utter loyalty, and threw herself on her husband's mercy with passionate appeals for forgiveness.

What was he to do?

All his masculine instincts rose in revolt. In spite of the fact that she had not sinned directly against him, he was angry and resentful. His love turned to revulsion and he hated where once he had been tender. For weeks he fought with himself, while the fortunes of the home hung in the balance. Then he came to me. What should he do to his wife?

At once I saw that the question was not simply what he should do to his wife but what he should do to himself. His soul as well as hers hung in the balance. If he left her, the chances were that she would go to ruin—he saw that. But what he did not so clearly see was that he would go to ruin too. He acknowledged that, under the circumstances, if he did go out from his home he would go out hating his wife, cursing women in general because of her, embittered, angry, burning himself up with resentment, and doing this all the more because he so deeply loved her. No one could talk with that man without seeing that there was only one way out which offered any hope of a real solution: he must generate enough good will and magnanimity to transcend his wife's fault and reunite his life with hers. If he could do that, he, she, and the home would all be saved. If he could not do that, he would ruin his own life as much as he would ruin hers.

Fortunately, he had sense enough to see that and strength enough to save his home.

THAT this is hard doctrine to believe and often much harder to practice is obvious, but it is true doctrine, not only morally but psychologically: the first wages of hate are always paid to the hater.

To be sure, nothing has ever evolved in human life, not even hatred, without serving some good purpose, and the present evil of hate cannot be understood without understanding its history. Our primitive forefathers not only had to get angry; they absolutely depended on anger for self-protection. In the primitive forest, where danger might lurk behind any tree, the man best fitted to survive was the man whose instincts of fear or anger were set on a hair-trigger. The man whose fear mechanism was slow in getting under way was likely to be bitten in two

You don't have to Coddle an Ingersoll Alarm Clock

NOBODY need ever have to make an Ingersoll Alarm Clock the pet of the family. Like Ingersoll Watches, these clocks are sturdy and dependable.

They combine the accuracy of more delicate timepieces with sound, solid construction. They tell time correctly and ring on time. They ring clearly and penetratingly. Knob alarm switches are an added convenience.

Good looks, too! Beautifully shaped handles that are part of the design; mat finish metal dials with artistic, readable numerals; heavy rolled edge cases; and graceful, curved feet make Ingersoll Alarm Clocks pleasing to look upon.

Made by the makers of Ingersoll Watches at Ingersoll prices—$1.50 to $4.50, covering both plain dial and Radiolite models.

before he got started in flight, and the man whose pugnacious rage took any appreciable time in getting roused was not fitted to handle a sudden fight with a dangerous enemy. Nature, therefore, weeded out the men whose instincts of fear and anger were tardy in operation and saved the men whose flight was instantaneous and whose wrath was explosive.

The results of this primitive selection are with us still. We all have glands waiting at the call of fear or rage to pour out into our blood the adrenal stimulant which almost instantaneously doubles and trebles our strength. The effect of this secretion is now definitely known. The blood leaves the head and the digestive organs and rushes to the running and fighting muscles. The boy fleeing from a bull can jump a fence that under normal circumstances he could not negotiate at all, and a man enraged may fight off ten men with superlative power. That is to say, in all primitive conditions where men face elemental perils and conflicts, nature's old provision evolved in the jungle serves its purpose well.

MODERN life, however, has largely outgrown the old conditions. To be sure, even on a city's streets, quick reaction in flight still is necessary to escape death, and no one can stand in the midst of traffic and say, "I do not choose to run." But in general neither fear nor rage is so useful as it was, and the man who is easily frightened or easily angered is hopelessly handicapped in the normal world of business.

Nevertheless, we still have the old fear-rage mechanism in our bodies. We still have the glands whose adrenal contribution to our system in times of flight and fight is instantaneously stimulating. In a word, we still get a kick out of anger and hatred.

Watch your own minds and see. I have yet to find the man whose mind, when he is fagged out and "all in," does not invariably tend to quarrelsome thoughts. The fatigued person always is difficult to get along with because the fatigued mind thinks vexed, angry, pugnacious thoughts, and the fatigued mind does this because it craves stimulant, and every inward quarrel it can conjure up which makes for rage calls the old glands to their work of producing the fight tonic.

One of the most wholesome bits of information that can come to anybody is this explanation of our quarrelsomeness when we are tired. The pugnacity of a worn mind is nothing in the world but a call for stimulants from the glands.

Hatred, therefore, has an inherited physical basis. The lower orders of married life thrive on domestic quarreling. The participants get a kick out of it. The rough, hard living of the frontiers sometimes expresses itself in a holiday devoted to fighting. The combatants enjoy the experience and get a thrill from it. Hate is a stimulant, a literal, physical stimulant just as whisky is, but it is similarly dangerous. A little whisky may perk you up; a little more paralyzes you. A little fear speeds your running; a little more freezes you cold. A little anger multiplies your strength; a little more makes you, for the time being, violently insane.

Under primitive, jungle conditions, the fear-and-rage stimulants worked themselves off in intense muscular activity and were, therefore, generally harmless, not to say useful. Under modern conditions the same stimulants have no such outlet and become dangerous poisons. Even from a physical standpoint, therefore, hatred is bad business for the hater.

To be sure, there is a favorable side of this ancient inheritance of ours which finds stimulus in a fight. A rousing conflict with an antagonist, working off our mettle, in a cause worthy of our devotion, is and always will be an exhilarating experience. Bismarck's biographer says of him, "When not fighting, he was hardly more than a misanthrope and a scoffer: his great energies were drained by doubt, cynicism, and melancholy. But the presence of an enemy restored them to unity, converted them into action and purpose, and gave him self-reliance by providing an external force against which his self-reliance could be directed." We all know what that experience means. The fact that we discover new powers in a fight can be seen in every range of life from Bismarck up. Emerson says of Daniel Webster that he "could never speak without an antagonist." Martin Luther's biographer remarks: "Anger he always recognized as his greatest fault, but he believed it a good thing in its place. He liked to be angry in a good cause, he once remarked. It refreshed him like a thunder storm, and he could write much better for it." Even Jesus cannot be understood without knowing the tremendous capacity for moral indignation that was in him. But in all such cases we have left far behind hatred in its narrower sense and have risen into the noble meaning of the Psalm: "Ye that love the Lord, hate evil." That always will be necessary.

Angry, quarrelsome, hateful attitudes toward people, however, are another matter. Anyone who finds himself relying on the kick that comes from them would better quit it. It is a perilous habit, like taking drugs. When a man begins relying on liquor to get through the day, his business or professional career is nearly finished. So is the career of a man who relies on the stimulant of hatred.

THE difficulty of putting into practice the sort of life which these injunctions imply becomes clear at once. You can no more get rid of the habit of hatred by trying than you can end the night by pushing out the dark. Something positive has to take the place of hate, as the sun has to rise before the night will go. And the only effective "bouncer" of hate is good will. Until positive good will is the rule of a man's life he will always be dallying more or less with hate.

Here, for example, is a young man who recently was cheated out of several hundred dollars by an acquaintance. It was a case of downright, deliberate crookedness. A few months afterward my friend met the defrauder on the street—a dejected down-and-out, disreputable, and woebegone figure. He tried to shrink away, but my friend faced him, and, asking the cause of his obvious trouble, received the reply, "Hunger—no food in twenty-four hours." My friend fed him and kept on for several weeks feeding him enough each day to sustain him. Moreover, he fed him also plain talk about the practical results of crookedness, and then got him employment and up to date has apparently succeeded in reëstablishing his defrauder's character and career.

The first reaction of some folks to such a true story would be pious pleasure over the good done to the defrauder. But let us not forget to take a long look inside the other man's life who had enough surplus good will to try the experiment. He is a healthy, wholesome, normal, right-minded spirit. In comparison with his internal state, hatred and vengefulness are morbid and sick. That is the fact I wish to drive home. Good will is not simply the only way to live with other people; it is the only way to live with yourself.

To be sure, good will need not be soft. There are crooks who have to be locked up and defrauders who cannot, offhand, be reformed by kindness. A man does not need to surrender his common sense and worldly wisdom in order to have good will. But even a very canny and shrewd good will is different by a long sea mile from hate.

THE plain fact is that, no matter what we think we think about this, we know what we really do think, by our admirations. No sane person admires vindictiveness or takes any pleasure in an exhibition of vengeance. But we all profoundly admire magnanimity. Take Lincoln, for example. He was called all the evil names that his enemies could lay their tongues to and if he had had any room in him for spite, grudge-bearing, and hate, he would have had ample opportunity to exercise them. What he said, however, was this: "No man, resolved to make the most of himself, can spare the time for personal contention. Still less can he afford to take all the consequences, including the vitiating of his temper and the loss of self-control." A very wise man, and we all know it when we see him. Once, when an acquaintance was expressing himself in terms of vindictiveness, Lincoln said: "You have more of that feeling of personal resentment than I have. Perhaps I have too little of it; but I never thought it paid."

Moreover, Lincoln in this regard lived the way he talked. Stanton said that he had found Lincoln a low, cunning clown. McClellan said that Stanton "never spoke of the President in any other way than as the 'original gorilla,' and often said that Du Chaillu was a fool to wander all the way to Africa in search of what he could so easily have found at Springfield, Illinois." Yet Lincoln, knowing Stanton's attitude, made him Secretary of War because he was the best man for the place. Years afterward that same Stanton stood at the bedside of the martyred President and, looking at the silent face, said, "There lies the most perfect ruler of men the world has ever seen."

Over against such a character, as clean of grudges as an autumn day with the west wind blowing it clear of mists, I think of many souls whom I have seen at close range in confessional confidences. As soon as they open even a small window into their inner lives, one can see what is inside. They are full of remembered discourtesies and wrongs, cherished grudges and resentments, accumulated angry moods and desires for retaliation, rankling hostilities long dwelt on and brooded over. To say that Lincoln's attitude is idealism and that this contrary attitude is practical is idiotic. Lincoln's attitude is the very essence of practicality. It is the only sensible way for any man to live who expects to exist decently with himself and happily with anybody else. But the prevalence of the contrary method is evidenced by the larger number of words used to express it. We are habitually peeved, piqued, nettled, miffed, provoked, irritated, and incensed; we are resentful, vindictive, mad, angry, retaliatory, and vengeful. Moreover, in these attitudes we commonly think that we are doing something punitive to somebody else, when we are only doing something destructive to ourselves.

What these false attitudes, fully developed, come to in the end is, of course, the delusion of persecution. Our asylums are full of people who started by suffering some injustice, who were thereupon resentful and talked to themselves a great deal about it, who, being either actually wronged by some individual or at least thinking so, nursed hatred against him, spent their leisure time inwardly blaming him and feeling righteous indignation against him, until at last they became border-line cases. Here is one who, having failed at his profession, has defended himself from self-reproach by blaming another. Then, finding comfort in hating his chosen scapegoat, he has habitually indulged in inner wrath until his mind is utterly warped and abnormal. Here is one who has suffered a real and outrageous wrong, who has had every right to feel indignant, and who, recognizing that right, has habitually practiced it. He has so wished to "get even" that that desire, as with Roger Chillingworth in "The Scarlet Letter," has consumed his own soul. Now, however, he discovers that while wrongs should, when possible, be righted, hating people in the process is like burning down your own house to get rid of a rat.

Or here is another man, who has identified his favorite social reform with himself. He started by being unselfishly devoted to the cause; then he became personally sensitive so that anything done against the cause was done against him; then he became bitterly resentful at all who differed from him or opposed him, until devotion to his cause had taken the form of hatred against all who do not share his views, and he is an unbalanced, pathological public nuisance. Such a man explains Beecher's exclamation that reforms were well enough but that he could not swallow the reformers.

CASES like these come to the psychiatrists and to the minister's "confessional" in an endless stream. They differ in multitudinous details but they are all alike in this: they illustrate the destructive consequence of hatred on the hater.

The longer I live and watch people, the more I put high up toward the top, as a primary requisite of a balanced and wholesome life, the determination of Booker Washington: ". . . resolved that I would permit no man . . . to narrow and degrade my soul by making me hate him."

It is only when we approach the matter from this angle that we can understand what the spiritual seers have meant by teaching us to love our enemies. To

How experienced motorists CUT TIRE EXPENSE

EXPERIENCED motorists are reducing their tire expense by following these simple suggestions:

FIRST: They see that a genuine Schrader Valve Inside, in good condition, is in every tire valve.

SECOND: They make sure they have an improved Schrader No. 880 Valve Cap screwed down tight by hand on every valve.

Should the valve inside become worn or damaged, this cap prevents escape of air at mouth of valve until a new inside can be inserted.

Always carry extra Schrader Valve Caps and Valve Insides in your car. Both are sold in red metal boxes of five at 25c a box.

Schrader products are sold by over 100,000 dealers throughout the world.

many people that injunction seems like stark nonsense or else like an airy ideal impossibly removed from real life. Of course, the fact is that nothing could be more compact with hard-headed common sense than the injunction to love our enemies.

If you are so unfortunate as to have enemies, that is the only thing which wisely can be done with them. They are too dangerous to one's peace of mind to be handled in any other way. The popular reaction to the words of Jesus, "Love your enemies," is that that would be fine for the enemies but utterly unjust to one's self. Upon the contrary, I suspect that Jesus was thinking primarily about the interests of the one who was tempted to hatred. He knew that hating enemies would not do the enemies so much harm as it would do the hater.

At any rate, he is a rash soul who turns lightly away from the testimony of the great seers of many races on this point. Said Buddha: "Let a man overcome anger by calmness; let him overcome evil by good; let him overcome the greedy by liberality, the liar by truth! . . . For hatred does not cease by hatred at any time: hatred ceases by not hating; this is an old rule."

One does not mean, of course, that this attitude so recommended by the seers shuts out severity or makes one a soft and pliable object of other people's wrong. There are times in personal relations when, with the utmost good will, quite free from bitterness, we must be rigorous and even hard. It is no kindness to anyone to let him run all over you. But well-considered and effective severity is a very different thing from hatred. So in dealing with a child, as Beecher said, a mother can have all Mount Calvary in her heart and all Mount Sinai in her hand, and the child get both.

LET me illustrate what the seers meant in a true story. In the course of the Armenian atrocities in 1922 a young woman and her brother were pursued down a street in Smyrna by a Turkish soldier, cornered in an angle of the wall, and the brother was slain before his sister's eyes. She dodged down an alley, leaped a wall, and escaped. Later, being a nurse, she was forced by the Turkish authorities to work in a military hospital. Into her ward was brought, one day, the same Turkish soldier who had slain her brother. He was very ill. A slight inattention would insure his death. The young woman confesses to the bitter struggle that took place in her mind. Equally to the man's good and to her own, the better side of her conquered, and she nursed him as carefully as any other patient in the ward. The recognition had been mutual, and one day, unable longer to restrain his curiosity, the Turk asked his nurse why she had not let him die; and when she replied, "I am a follower of Him who said 'Love your enemies and do them good,'" he was silent for a long time. At last he spoke: "I never knew that there was such a religion. If that is your religion tell me about it, for I want it."

This is putting the principle of good will to a very severe test, but is there any question as to the wisdom of that girl's action? From Buddha to the modern psychiatrist, from Jesus to Lincoln, the seers would give one answer.

We have been dealing so far with the disastrous effect of hatred on those who harbor it. Suppose now that we imagine the kind of consequence that comes to the hater multiplied immeasurably in the population. What a devastating social curse hatred is!

A teacher of dramatic art had a friendly acquaintance with a woman who one day cut him dead in the hotel parlor. He demanded an explanation. "I have heard that you have a Japanese pupil," said the woman. "And why," said the teacher in astonishment, "should my having a Japanese pupil prevent you from speaking to me?" "Because I don't like Japanese," said the woman. "What reason have you for disliking the Japanese?" was the query. "I don't know," said the woman, "but I hate the Japanese and," she added with a vicious accent, "I hate Italians."

PERSONALLY, if I had to name the most dangerous and damnable sin on earth, I should name that kind of spirit. Its devastating effects are written large in every war, in every outburst of racial hatred, in innumerable oppressions and ostracisms. The record of its heartbreaks surpasses the record of any other human evil. It tears class from class and race from race, makes different religions bitter enemies instead of spiritual partners, and its results in bloodshed between nations cause civilization today to be a brief interval between catastrophes. It is the world's worst sin.

That woman who hated people by groups, not knowing why, and who cut those who would not share her hatred, walked in respectable society, but she was a carrier of a deadly moral pestilence. She may have called herself a Christian, gone to church and recited the creed, but, for all that, she was a specially accredited ambassador of the evil one.

As with the individual aspects of hatred, so with its social aspects; the source lies far back in the instincts of the race. In primitive days every stranger was an enemy. People then had no speedier means of communication than a horse. They either made war upon strangers or else they stayed at home, shut themselves up in walled towns, and were suspicious about every unfamiliar face. The early Greeks called all non-Greeks barbarians, and that word is simply the scornful imitation of "bar, bar, bar," which is the way all foreign language sounded to Greek ears. In such a stage of human culture Greeks would not even recognize moral obligation toward a non-Greek, and there would be no more compunction then about slaughtering strangers than there would be among us about slaughtering sheep. Duty was tribally limited. Many a custom still lingers among us, illustrating this point of view. Why do we clasp right hands when we meet? Because of old when two men met it was the best way to be sure that neither could draw sword upon the other. Far back our traditions go to a time when everything strange—strange clothes, strange color, strange manners, strange speech—denoted hostility. Without reason, without investigation, men at that time were suspicious of anybody unlike themselves.

Scattergood and the Six Big Men

"Any mention of the fire bell, Pliny? Figger to take him into your confidence about the bell?"

Pliny glanced at Scattergood's face, found it not enlightening, and guessed:

"I wouldn't mention it."

"G'-by, Pliny."

"G'-by, Scattergood."

Pliny made his way up the street; Scattergood remained seated until he heard the dinner bell in the hotel, when he ambled over to eat exhaustively before setting out upon his drive. He figured he could cover the road to Half Acre in two hours, attend to such concerns as demanded his attention in an hour, and drive back safely by six o'clock. . . . If he was allowed to drive back.

SO, AT one o'clock his round-flanked horse carried him across the bridge and trotted comfortably to the westward. A quarter of a mile from the bottle mouth of the valley he drove his buggy off the road and tied the horse among the young spruces where it would be securely hidden. Not that he purposed to remain in concealment, but before he ventured into the town he wished to observe.

From a vantage point upon a shoulder of the cliff he watched the cluster of straggling, squatting, paintless houses, with their shingles curling like feathers on the back of some squalid bird. He saw smoke arising from kitchen chimneys, saw bedraggled children clawing one another in the road; heard screams of rage in a feminine voice, and raucous male laughter. There were no yards, nor lawns; everything was ramshackle and shabby and overgrown with weeds.

Two big men came from a house and walked between the buildings to what might have been a store, but which, in all probability dispensed more liquids than solids. There was no mistaking the swagger of their shoulders or the bulk of them. They were Haddys. One of them kicked, unnecessarily, a dog out of his way, and it ran, cringing and howling. Scattergood frowned.

"Whisky and drugs and in-breedin' and deviltry," he said to himself.

Presently he made his way down again and back to his horse. It was his intention to drive openly into the village, accepting Pete Haddy's ominous invitation to call. He had gone not more than a hundred yards before a faint sound at the roadside arrested him. For an instant, he thought it the mewing of a kitten; but it was not that—it was something between a stifled sob and a wail, very low, very private, very personal. Scattergood listened, and then stepped over his buggy wheel softly and peered through the screen of bushes.

There, huddled on the long grass, was a girl, a girl with hair which the old man indiscriminatingly labeled as red; but it was not red. It was beautiful hair though unkempt, thick and waving. Small hands covered the face, small feet in ill-fitting shoes moved convulsively as she sobbed. While he stood a moment watching her, she sat up, wiped her eyes and leaned despairingly back against a tree. Scattergood cleared his throat.

"What ails ye?" he asked.

The girl turned toward him in panic, her eyes suddenly wide, her hands lifted, as if to ward off attack.

"Who—who are you?" she whispered.

"Name of Baines. Somebody been a-hurtin' ye?"

She shook her head.

"Live yonder?" he asked, studying her face.

SHE nodded, and he saw that she was undeniably pretty. He did not envy her that loveliness, for it was an undesirable possession in Half Acre. Much better for a girl to be a slattern and hideous. And she seemed intelligent—and more—capable of feeling.

"What's your name?" he asked, his interest quickening.

"Haddy," she said.

"Sister to the Six Big Men?"

"Yes."

"I've heard you spoke of. Friend of mine mentioned ye. Boy by the name of Norton."

"Oh! . . . Oh. . . . Is he—is he alive?"

"Kind of damaged in his disposition, and hacked up consid'able as to his features, but 'tain't interfered with his spryness."

"I'm so glad—so glad. They said—"

"Um. Folks does say— And so, takin' everythin' into consideration, I calc'lated I'd come out and kind of look things over and all. . . . Now, about Freddie; seems as though you set a sight of store by him."

"It ain't any use," she said despairingly. "They wouldn't ever let me go. Seems as though they hate everybody outside of Half Acre."

"And, from what I hear, they hain't so fond of folks in Half Acre."

"You don't know. Nobody knows. . . . Nobody that ain't lived here all her life can know. Oh," she bowed her head again and her shoulders quivered, "I dunno what's goin' to happen to me. I'm scairt—I'm scairt all the time."

"What of?"

She looked up into his eyes, and he saw a great fear, a deep abhorrence in them.

"They've watched me—my six brothers. Seems as though they've had a pride in keepin' me as I be. Not like the other women in Half Acre. 'Tain't because they want me to be good, but just so's to show off. Nobody dast touch me or anythin'; but all the time I keep thinkin' it's for some purpose. There's suthin' they figger to do with me; and I'm afraid of it."

"Um. . . . And do ye want to be a good girl?"

"I've never seen much good," she said. "I dunno's I know just what bein' good is. But what I want is everythin' Half Acre ain't. Drunken women and drunken men—and terrible goin's on! Oh, if I could only git away from it all and be like other folks—like I think other folks be." She looked up at him piteously. "I ain't ever wanted anythin' else," she said.

"Folks has different kinds of ambitions," he said noncommittally. "Just what form does your desirin' to be good take?"

"It's awful hard to put into words," she said. "I—I want to be where I never hear sich things and see sich sights. I

"That's the way to travel, Bob—no crowded roads, no punctures or delays of any kind."

"Yes, I suppose we'll all be traveling that way some day, but in the meantime, a good car with Kelly-Springfield tires all around is about the most comfortable and carefree way I know of."

Don't Gamble with "cheap" paint

ANY time you sit in a game with "cheap" paint, you are beaten before you start. The low-price-per-gallon is "apple-sauce." It makes you think you are winning. That is one of "cheap" paint's smart tricks. But the result is inevitable. "Cheap" paint always holds the winning hand. No matter how you play the cards you can't win. The only doubtful point about the game is how much you will lose.

"Cheap" paint is low priced because it is cheaply made of cheap materials. But it covers only 250 square feet per gallon, two coats.

Fine old SWP House Paint costs more per gallon. That is because it is made of the finest ingredients according to a scientifically "balanced" formula.

But it covers 360 square feet per gallon, two coats. Some difference!

Where you need 11 gallons of the "cheap" paint to do the average house, only 7 gallons of fine old SWP are required. That's four gallons difference.

So the low price is a fooler. Adding four extra gallons, your "cheap" paint costs practically the same as fine old SWP. But oh, what a difference in results!

That is one way "cheap" paint outsmarts you. But that is not all.

"Cheap" paint, with its inferior materials and "cheap" colors has very little resistance.

Very early in life it begins to chip, crack, chalk and peel. The cheap-looking colors begin to fade and wash out. In a very short time

Many up-to-date painters use and endorse fine old SWP House Paint. They tell us that its equal in smoothness, covering, hiding and durability cannot possibly be produced by hand mixing.

PREPARED PAINT AT ITS BEST your average "cheap" paint finish is through. Then you burn or scrape it off and do it all over again.

Fine old SWP, on the other hand, with its beautiful, weather-proof colors, gives you a stylish, rich-looking job from the start. It weathers very slowly. And you can figure upon an average of 5 years before repainting.

This is very important in this age of beauty, when even the outside of the home is made brilliant with color.

So there's your answer. A cheap-looking, "cheap" paint finish costs you practically the same as SWP to start with. And it costs you two and a half times as much for repainting.

In other words, "cheap" paint is the most expensive paint you can use.

The "Master Touch"

Even among first-rate paints SWP is outstanding. That is because there is one element in every gallon of SWP—the vital element—which cannot be imitated or duplicated.

It is the "Master Touch"—that spark of genius—which makes such scientific giants as Edison, Marconi, Burbank, and others loom up above all others in their respective fields.

The scientific men at the head of the great Sherwin-Williams laboratories are blessed with this Master Touch.

Their genius shows in the superfine raw materials made by Sherwin-Williams—in the delicate, scientific balancing of ingredients—in the beautiful weather-proof colors—in the great power-driven mills that grind and mix SWP to creamy-smooth texture—in the critical checking and rechecking that follows each step in the process.

No "cheap" paint maker even attempts such perfection. Even the most skillful cannot duplicate the Master Touch. It is purely Sherwin-Williams.
